A movement for the suppression of gambling and the enforcement of the Sunday law in New Orleans has been organized. An Association styled the Sunday-closing and Anti-gambling League, with a membership of 450, has been formed, and $30,000 has been subscribed as a fund to prosecute the gamblers and violators of the Sunday law.

Good living

doesn't come from riches. It comes first, and brings riches. While the poor man walks, he will stay poor. His prosperity begins when he rides, and eats a good dinner, and carries a good watch. A "poor" watch is the very badge of poverty, worse than none; but either condition is too expensive for a poor man: he can't afford to lose the time of day. Keeping that under his thumb, he may yet be wealthy. Then comes true economy: diamonds for his wife; a man to guard them. But still, for his own pocket, the same trusty watch that "made" him: the quick-winding Waterbury.

Buffalo's Vice-Ridden Canal District, Once the Terror of the City, now a Centre of Gospel Effort—How the Work of the Homestead Mission has been Blessed.

FEW American cities of like size afford a better field for missionary work than Buffalo. In October, 1889, the delegates to the Christian Workers' Convention, then in session in that city, aided by the laymen and clergy of Buffalo, were led to open a Rescue Mission on Ohio Street, a locality where such a work was greatly needed. After months of financial struggle, the Mission was moved to No. 163 Canal Street, and some time later, an unknown friend gave $10,000 to the project. This sum was placed in the hands of trustees as the nucleus of a fund to carry on aggressive Christian work among the poor of the city. The Christian Homestead Association was incorporated and its affairs are directed by nine leading business men of Buffalo, members of different evangelical churches.

Buffalo stands at the foot of the Lakes and at the head of the Erie Canal and consequently is the rendezvous of thousands of homeless, drifting men. It has been the policy of the police to try and confine this rough element, with scant restrictions, to a little district of which Canal street is the centre or artery, and the result is startling. Not even Chicago or New York can point to a section where vice and misery are more closely huddled together, or where the social condition is so low and degraded as to be more lawless and godless than this. In the district are 296 places of business of which 125 sell liquor, seventeen are "free theatres"—the lowest class of variety show—eighty are disreputable houses, without liquor licence, yet where alcoholic drinks are sold, and there are about ninety-one second-hand stores, barber and cobbler-shops and restaurants—in other words, only about thirty per cent. of the entire business of the district can be classed as legitimate.

THE RESCUE MISSION, CANAL ST., BUFFALO, N.Y.

It was not an easy task that had been undertaken, and for nearly a year it was conducted under most discouraging pecuniary circumstances. In June, 1891, Walter N. Hinman took charge of the mission as Superintendent and through his tireless devotion to the work was the means, under God, of infusing spirit and energy into it and making the Homestead Rescue Mission a power for righteousness in the district. The building in which the Rescue Mission was located, at No. 163 Canal Street, had been formerly a saloon; but now it was transformed into a cheerful and attractive place. It was kept open all day long and Rescue or Gospel meetings for adults were held there every night, the average nightly attendance being about fifty persons. Not a night passed in which some did not rise to ask for special prayer that they might be led to accept Christ. Numbers were converted and of these a very large proportion are now leading better lives. There is good reason to believe that at least one hundred men who once were in different stages of drunkennesss, destitution and crime are now, through the means of this mission, industrious Christians. Some have been reunited to wives and families; some, for obvious reasons, have left the city which witnessed their degradation; others have secured permanent work elsewhere, and still others are scattered through the lumber camps in different parts of the State.

Those rough-spoken and besotted men are often easily persuaded to try earnestly to live the better life, but their habits and their surroundings conspire to drag them down in spite of themselves. For this reason the five-story building No's 84 and 86 Lloyd street, was rented and equipped as a Homestead Lodging House with accommodations for 150 men, and the property itself has since been purchased. This Lodging House was opened in November 1891. It contains a room adapted either for meetings or a restaurant where men can be accommodated at means within the reach of the very poorest. There is also a large and pleasant reading-room. The dormitory is a clean, light loft, with stout wooden flooring, white walls and ceiling. The cots are iron, and at the head of each is a clothes closet, where the occupant can lock up his garments and other belongings. The Reading and Sitting-Room is really a comfortable looking apartment—more like that in some respectable middle-class hotel than in a mission. It is well lighted, abundantly supplied with chairs, and on the walls are several pictures including a copy of the celebrated painting: "Christ before Pilate," by Munkacsy. Over 100 men are now housed at the Homestead. Work for nearly 100 men is secured every year through the instrumentality of the mission, and very few of those so helped have proved unworthy. The amount of destitution in the district is appalling and there are many piteous appeals for shelter, food and clothing at the Rescue mission. Through the liberality of Christian friends who have contributed to the work, these demands have thus far been met by the mission and many hundreds of deserving cases have receive substantial assistance. One of the happiest results of the work accomplished by the Homestead Mission is the great improvement in morals and general character that is now everywhere perceptible in the populous district adjoining the canal. On one street alone, seventeen concert and dance places have been closed and, with the co-operation of the authorities, it is believed that the punfication will be permanent. The work has aroused the interest of the pastors of Buffalo, and clergymen frequently attend the meetings and inspect the field, noting with gratification the changes that have taken place. In addition to the slum and rescue work and the management of the lodging-house, the Homestead Association is a beneficent power in many other ways, its members making visits to the sick, to families, to hospitals, working among the children and fallen women, distributing flowers and tracts and Gospel cards, and doing other personal missionary work. Miss Johanna D. Cutter, the female missionary of these Homestead, labors among the women of the district, her entire time and income being devoted to these duties. Another successful laborer is Miss Ida K. Grein, missionary for the children. The Trustees of the Homestead, including President George N. Pierce, Vice-President H. C. Harrower, Secretary J. J. McWilliams, Treasurer S. M. Clement, Jr., and Trustees Woodworth, Kellogg, Hopkins, Hedstrom, Bond and Johnson, vie with each other in active consecration to the work of reclaiming the fallen and forsaken in a section hitherto neglected. The field in which these servants of the Master labor covers ten blocks or more, and has a resident population of several thousand, while thousands of homeless sailors and wanderers drift into it constantly.

WALTER N. HINMAN.

THE HOMESTEAD MISSION, LLOYD STREET, BUFFALO, NEW YORK.

It has been known in times past as "the infected district"—the distinguishing mark of moral and physical pollution. It had neither church nor school-house, nor book-store, and was wholly given over to vice and lawlessness. In less than two years, under the Divine blessing, such a change has already been wrought as has surprised the people of Buffalo. Through the efforts of the Homestead's devoted workers, regular church services are now

MAY-TIME THOUGHTS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: "A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon." Solomon's Song 4: 15.

SOME of the finest gardens of olden times were to be found at the foot of Mount Lebanon. Snow descended, and winter whitened the top of the mountain; then, when the warm spring weather came, the snows melted and poured down the side of the mountain, and gave great luxuriance to the gardens at the foot; and you see now the allusion of my text, when it speaks of the fountain of gardens, and streams from Lebanon.

Again and again the church is represented as a garden, all up and down the Word of God, and it is a figure specially suggestive at this season of the year, when the parks and the orchards are about to put forth their blossom, and the air is filled with bird-voices.

A mother wished to impress her child with the love of God; and so in the spring-time, after the ground had been prepared in the garden, she took a handful of flower-seed, and scattered these seeds in the shape of letters all across the bed of the garden. Weeks passed by, and the rains and the sunshine had done their work, and one day the child came in and said, "Mother, come quickly to the garden—come now." The mother followed the child to the garden, and the little child said, "Look here, mother! see, it is spelt all over the ground in flowers, 'God is Love.'"

O my friends! if we only had faith enough, we could see Gospel lessons all around and about us—lessons in shells on the beach, lessons in sparkles on the wave, lessons in stars on the sky, lessons in flowers all over the earth.

Well, my friends, you know very well that there have been some beautiful gardens created. There was the garden of Charlemagne, and you remember that this king ordered gardens laid out all through the realm, and decided by decree of government what kind of flowers should be planted in those gardens. Henry IV., at Montpellier, decreed that there should be flowers planted throughout his realm, and gardens laid out, and he specially decreed that there should be Alpine pyrena and French plants. Shenstone the poet was more celebrated for his gardens than for his poetry: his poetry has faded from the ages for the most part, but his gardens are immortal; to all the beauty of his place he added perfection of art. Palisade and arch and arbor and fountain and rustic temple had their most wonderful specimens, and the oak and the hazel and the richest woods of the forest were planted in that garden. He had genius and he had industry, and all his genius and all his industry, he applied to the beautification of that garden. He gave for it $1,500 and he sold it at last for $85,000, or what was equal to that number of dollars. It was an expensive garden, laid out with great elaboration. And yet I have to tell you now of a garden of vaster expense—the garden spoken of in my text—a fountain of gardens with the streams from Lebanon.

Walter Scott had the great ambition of his life to build Abbotsford and lay out extensive gardens round about it. It broke his heart that he could not complete the work as he desired it. At his last payment of £100,000, after laying out those gardens, and building that palace of Abbotsford, at that time his heart broke, his health failed, and he died almost an imbecile.

A few years ago, when I walked through those gardens, and I thought at what vast expense they had been laid out, at the expense of that man's life, it seemed I could see in the crimson flowers the blood of the old man's broken heart. But I have to tell you now of a garden laid out at vaster expense—who can calculate that vast expense. Tell me, ye women who watched him hang. tell me, ye executioners who lifted and let him down; tell me, thou sun that didst hide, and ye rocks that did fall, what the laying out of this garden cost. This morning, amid the aroma and brightness of the spring-time, it is appropriate that I show you how the Church of Christ is a garden.

I remark first, it is a garden because of the rare plants in it. That would be a strange garden in which there were no flowers. If you cannot find them anywhere else you will find them along the paths, and you will find them at the gateway.

If there be no especial taste and no especial means, you will find there the hollyhock, and the daffodil, and the dahlia. If there be no especial taste and no especial means, you will find the Mexican cactus, and the blue-bell, and the arbutus, and the clusters of oleanders.

Flowers there must be in every garden, and I have to tell you that in the garden of the church are the rarest plants. Sometimes you will find the violet, inconspicuous, but sweet as heaven—Christian souls, with no pretence, but of vast usefulness, comparatively unknown on earth, but to be glorious in celestial spheres. Violets and violets all the time. You cannot tell where these Christians have been, save by the brightening face of the invalid, or the steaming tureen on the stand near the sick pillow, or the new curtain that keeps out the glare of the sun from the poor man's cot. Such characters are perhaps better typified by the ranunculus which goes creeping between the thorns and the briars of this life, giving a kiss for a sting; and many a man has thought that life before him was a black rock of trouble, and found it covered all over with delightsome jessamine of Christian sympathy.

In this garden of the Lord I find the Mexican cactus, loveliness within, thorns without, men with great sharpness of behavior and manner, but within them the peace of God, the love of God, the grace of God. They are hard men to handle, ugly men to touch, very apt to strike back when you strike them, yet within them all loveliness and attraction, while outside so completely unfortunate. Mexican cactus all the time.

Said a placid elder to a Christian minister, "Doctor, you would do better to control your temper." "Ah!" said the minister to the placid elder, "I control more temper in five minutes than you do in five years." These people, gifted men, who have great exasperation of manner, and seem to be very different from what they should be, really have in their souls that which commends them to the Lord. Mexican cactus all the time. So a man said to me years ago, "Do you think I ought to become a member of the church—I have such a violent temper?

"Yesterday I was crossing Jersey City Ferry. It was very early in the morning, and I saw a milkman putting a large quantity of water into his can, and, I said, 'That is enough, sir,' and he got off the cart and insulted me, and I knocked him down. Well," said he, "do you think I could ever become a Christian?" That man had in his soul the grace of the Lord Jesus, but outside he was full of thorns, and full of brambles, and full of exasperations; but he could not hear the story of a Saviour's mercy told without having the tears roil down his cheek. There was loveliness within, but roughness outside. Mexican cactus all the time.

But I remember in boyhood that we had in our father's garden what we called the Giant of Battle, a peculiar rose, very red and very fiery. Suggestive flower, it was called the Giant of Battle. And so in the garden of the Lord we find that kind of flower—the Pauls and Martin Luthers, the Wycliffes, the John Knoxes—Giants of Battle. What in other men is a spark, in them is a conflagration; when they pray, their prayers take fire. When they suffer they sweat great drops of blood; when they preach it is a pentecost; when they fight it is a Thermopylæ; when they die it is martyrdom,—Giants of Battle. You say, "Why have we not more of them in the Church of Christ at this time?" I answer your question by asking another: "Why have we not more Cromwells and Humboldts in the world?" God wants only a few Giants of Battle: they do their work, and they do it well.

But I find also in the Church of God a plant that I shall call the snowdrop. Very beautiful but cold; it is very pure, pure as the snowdrop, beautiful as the snowdrop, and as cold as the snowdrop. No special sympathy. That kind of man never loses his patience; he never weeps, he never flashes with anger, he never utters a rash word. Always cold, always precise, always passive, beautiful snowdrop, but I don't like him: I would rather have one Giant of Battle than 5 000 snowdrops.

Give me a man who may make some mistakes in his ardor for the Lord's service, rather than that kind of nature which spends its whole life doing but one thing, and that is keeping equilibrium. There are snowdrops in all the churches—men without any sympathy. Very good; they are in the garden of the Lord, therefore I know they ought to be there; but always snowdrops.

You have seen in some places perhaps a century plant. I do not suppose there is a person in this house who has ever seen more than one century plant in full bloom, and when you see the century plant your emotions are stirred. You look at it and say, "This flower has been gathering up its beauty for a whole century, and it will not bloom again for another hundred years." Well I have to tell you that in this garden of the Church, spoken of in my text, there is a century plant.

It has gathered up its bloom from all the ages of eternity, and nineteen centuries ago it put forth its glory. It is not only a century plant but a passion-flower—The passion-flower of Christ; a crimson flower, blood at the root, and blood on the leaves, the passion-flower of Jesus, the century plant of eternity. Come, O winds from the north, and winds from the south, and winds from the east, and winds from the west, and scatter the perfume of this flower through all nations.

His worth, if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love him too.

Thou, the Christ of all the ages, hast garments smelling of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces.

I go further, and say the church of Christ is appropriately compared to a garden because of its thorough irrigation. There can be no luxuriant garden without plenty of water. I saw a garden in the midst of the desert, amid the Rocky Mountains. I said, How is it possible you have so many flowers, so much rich fruit in a desert for miles around? I suppose some of you have seen those gardens. Well, they told me they had aqueducts and pipes reaching up to the hills, and the snows melted on the Sierra Nevada and the Rocky Mountains, and then poured down in water to those aqueducts, and it kept the fields in great luxuriance. And I thought to myself—how like the garden of Christ! All around it the barrenness of sin and the barrenness of the world, but our eyes are unto the hills, from whence cometh our help. There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of our God, the fountain of gardens and streams from Lebanon. Water to slake the thirst, water to refresh the fainting, water to wash the unclean, water to toss up in fountains under the sun of righteousness, until you can see the rainbow around the throne.

I wandered in a garden of Brazilian cashew-nut, and I saw the luxuriance of those gardens were helped by the abundant supply of water. I came to it on a day when strangers were not admitted, but, by a strange coincidence, at the moment I got in, the king's chariot passed and the gardener went up on the hill and turned on the water, and it came flashing down the broad stairs of stone, until sunlight and wave in gleesome wrestle tumbled at my feet. And so it is with this garden of Christ. Everything comes from above—pardon from above, peace from above, comfort from above, sanctification from above. Streams from Lebanon, oh! the consolation in this thought. Would God that the gardeners turned on the fountain of salvation until the place where we sit and stand might become Elim with twelve wells of water and threescore and ten palm-trees. But I hear his sound at the garden gate: I hear the lifting of the latch of the gate. Who comes there? It is the Gardener, who passes in through the garden gate. He comes through this path of the garden, and he comes to the aged man, and he says, "Old man, I come to help thee, I come to strengthen thee. Down to hoary hairs I will shelter thee; I will give thee strength at the time of old age: I will not leave; I will never forsake thee. Peace, broken-hearted old man, I will be thy consolation forever."

And then Christ the Gardener comes up another path of the garden, and he sees a soul in great trouble, and he says, "Hush, troubled spirit; the sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night: the Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; the Lord shall preserve thy soul." And then the Gardener comes up another path of the garden, and he comes where there are some beautiful buds, and I say, "Stop, O Gardener, do not break them off." But he breaks them off, the beautiful buds, and I see a great flutter among the leaves, and I wonder what he is doing, and he says, "I do not come to destroy these flowers: I am only going to plant them in a higher terrace, and in the garden around my palace. I have come into my garden to gather lilies. I must take back a whole cluster of rosebuds. Peace, troubled soul; all shall be well. Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Oh glorious Gardener of the Church!

Christ comes to it now, and he has a right to come. We look into the face of the Gardener as he breaks off the bud, and we say, "Thou art worthy to have them; thy will be done." The hardest prayer a bereaved father or mother ever uttered—"Thy will be done."

But you have noticed that around every king's garden there is a high wall. You may have stood at the wall of a king's court and thought "How I would like to see that garden;" and while you were watching, the gardener opened the gate and the royal equipage swept through it and you caught a glimpse of the garden, but only a glimpse, for then the gates closed.

I bless God that this Garden of Christ has gates on all sides, that they are opened by day, opened by night, and whosoever will may come in. Oh! how many there are who die in the desert when they might revel in the garden! How many there are who are seeking in the garden of this world that satisfaction which they can never find!

It was so with Theodore Hook, who made all nations laugh while he was living. And yet Theodore Hook on a certain day, when in the midst of his revelry he caught a glimpse of his own face and his own apparel in the mirror, said, "That is true. I look just as I am—lost, body, mind, soul and estate, lost!" And so it was with Shenstone about his garden, of which I spoke in the beginning of my sermon. He sat down amid all its beauty and wrung his hands and said, "I have lost my way to happiness, I am frantic; I hate everything; I hate myself as a madman ought to." Alas! so many in the gardens of this world are looking for that flower they can never find except in the garden of Christ.

Substantial comfort will not grow
In nature's barren soil.
All we can boast till Christ we know
Is vanity and toil.

How many have tried all the fountains of this world's pleasure, but never tasted of the stream from Lebanon! How many have revelled in other gardens, to their soul's ruin, but never plucked one flower from the garden of our God! I swing open all the gates of the garden and invite you in, whatever your history, whatever your sins, whatever your temptations, whatever your trouble. The invitation comes no more to one than to all: "Whosoever will, let him come."

The flowers of earthly gardens soon fade, but, blessed be God, there are garlands that never wither, and through the grace of Christ Jesus we may enter into the joys which are provided for us at God's right hand. Remember, as the closing thought, that God not only brings us into a garden here, but it is a garden all the way with those who trust and love and serve him, a garden all through the struggles of this life, a garden all up the slope of heaven.

There everlasting spring abides
And never-withering flowers.
Death, like a narrow stream, divides
That heavenly land from ours.

EMIN PASHA POSSIBLY ALIVE.

The reports of the death of Emin Pasha in Africa are not credited in Germany. Dr. Stuhlmann, Emin's former comrade, believes that he will yet be heard from on the shores of Lake Tchad.

"Prince."

The Remarkable Story of an African Potentate's Conversion and his Gratitude to his Benefactor, who secured his Freedom.

SOMETIME in the beginning of the present century, Dr. Cox, an intelligent and energetic young man, graduating at a medical college in Ireland, with a few friends made a tour of exploration in the interior of Africa. He was caught between two armies then contending in one of the wars so common there, and taken by a prince as a captive. He was held for three years, and by his common-sense and ingenuity rendered himself useful and was highly esteemed by the African potentate. He taught the prince the English language and learned from him the African dialect.

After three years, the Doctor expressed his great anxiety to be with his family again in England.

"Why did you not tell me you have a family?" he asked. "You know I love you and don't know how I can well do without you; but I must carry you to the sea and send you back to your family."

The prince gathered up a small command, of about two hundred men, and with the Doctor went to the Mediterranean Sea, engaged and settled his passage on an English vessel, and then returned home.

Soon the prince was again at war with a neighboring tribe, and this time his army was defeated, and he taken a prisoner. Some of the wounded were killed, but the prince was sold to a slave-dealer, who was seeking a cargo for the markets of the South-land, then so inviting. The prince, with others, was brought to New Orleans, and from the slave-pen there he was purchased by Mr. Tom Foster, and brought to his cotton plantation in Adams County, near to Washington, Miss., a short distance from Natchez.

Mr. Foster was proud of his new slave. "Prince," as he was called, was a man of character, and already knew the English language. He was liked by his master, and was made a foreman on the plantation. He attended religious meetings, and, becoming converted, united with the Baptist Church. He was in a little while honored by his church as a deacon. He grew in the confidence of his master, and in favor with all who knew him. He had an interesting wife and children. I have myself conversed with one of his sons about this.

About ten years after Prince was in Mississippi, Dr. Cox, not finding such practice as he wished, determined to emigrate to the United States, and landed with his family in New Orcountry, he settled at Washington, Adams County, Miss., only a few miles from the plantation of Mr. Foster. A day or two afterward, when Prince was selling potatoes for his master in Washington, he met Dr. Cox, and, recognizing him at once, threw down the bag, and embracing Dr. Cox, exclaimed:

"Dr. Cox! Dr. Cox! Don't you know me?"

"Why! who are you, sir?"

"I am Prince. I held you as my captive in Africa for three years! I sent you to England, and how came you here?"

The Doctor perceiving that he was recognized, at once acknowledged the fact, and comparing notes, they were again fast friends. Dr. Cox then promised to aid in returning Prince to his people. Prince said:

"Not so; I would only go back to carry the glorious Gospel there, to my fatherland. I love my Saviour, and now rejoice that my slavery has brought me into the knowledge of the Gospel of Christ. I am happy here! I am (though a slave), the Lord's freeman. I love my Master and would only consent to return to that land, that I might aid in presenting the Gospel to my kinsmen according to the flesh! I would only go that way, Dr. Cox! and only with my wife and children!"

Conference was then had with Mr. Foster, the master, and with Mr. Henry Clay, the warm friend of the Colonization Society, and Prince and his family, having been purchased for two thousand dollars from Mr. Foster, they were sent back to Africa on a United States vessel Mr. Henry Clay paying a part of the purchase money and President Adams approving and possibly aiding in this scheme.

I have had these incidents substantiated by descendants of Dr. Cox who lived in Natchez in 1877 and 1878. W. H. Robert.

TRANSFORMED BY GRACE.

held, there is a growing Sunday School, a Sewing School for girls, a Kitchen-garden School with semi-weekly sessions, a Girls' Prayer-meeting, a Women's Meeting, night meetings for men, free baths, a Free Supper Friday nights during the cold months, and a generous system of aid for all who may need it. The Homestead Lodging-House shelters nearly 50,000 men every year, and gives over 5,000 free baths. At the restaurant over 100,000 meals at prices from 2 to 10 cents are served in the same period. At the free suppers in the Rescue Mission during the cold season 10,250 sandwiches were distributed and a like number of cups of coffee.

Wholly dependent upon contributions from those interested in the work, the Homestead Mission has endeavored with all the powers and facilities at its disposal, to capture this stronghold of sin for Christ. Its efforts thus far have been greatly blessed. With larger resources, it might have accomplished even greater results. On the first page of this issue of The Christian Herald are illustrations showing the Rescue Mission on Canal Street, and the lodging house on Lloyd Street—the latter a large five-story building, which the Mission recently purchased for $10,000, of which $4,000 has been paid. A portrait is also given of Mr. Walter N. Hinman, the Superintendent of the Homestead Association, to whom is due in a great measure its remarkable growth in the field of Christian helpfulness and evangelization.

He was born in Ontario County, New York, August 11, 1854. He is a Presbyterian. Both of his parents were ardent temperance advocates. He received a good education and a happy and prosperous life seemed to be his; but he made the fatal mistake of thinking he had no need of a personal Saviour. For twelve years he fought a losing battle with drink. On the night of Oct. 3, 1890, he wandered into St. Bartholomew's Mission, New York City, a seemingly ruined and lost man, where he was converted.

He went forth from the Mission a redeemed man. The change in his life was complete. He began at once an earnest, Christian life, and the result is manifest in the zeal and ardor with which he has conducted the successful warfare on the hotbeds of sin in the city of Buffalo.

In the diagram printed on this page (prepared by Superintendent Hinman), the character of the district in which the Homestead Mission operates is strikingly illustrated. It is indeed a sin-infected section and one in which there is still abundant room for Gospel effort. Under Providence, it has already been greatly improved and there is hope that it may ere long, be spiritually cleansed throughout and become an honor instead of, as it was in the past, a disgrace to humanity and to one of the leading cities of the Union.

THE KEY.

God holds the key of all unknown,
And I am glad;
If other hands should hold the key,
Or if He trusted it to me,
I might be sad.
What if to-morrow's cares were here
Without its rest?
Better that He unlock the day,
And as the doors swing open say,
"My will is best."

REPENTANCE.

THOUGH filled with sin as dark as nigh
And deep as ocean's wave;
If with repentant hearts we come
There's One our souls can save.

With contrite hearts and humble voice,
If we but seek His face.
'Twill cause the angels to rejoice
Around the throne of grace.

And if we gain the wondrous prize
Of life's eternal spring,
On wings of light our souls shall rise,
Ten thousand praises sing.

THE TESTIMONY OF LIFE.

In a recent letter from P'iang-yang Fu, China, Mr. T. H. King, who is laboring for Christ in that town, in speaking of some recent converts, says: "One is an old man named Wang, the father of one of our brightest Christians. He was led to decide for Christ through being asked, as the head of his clan, to consent to have a nephew beaten because he would not worship his ancestors. This nephew had lived a bad life, and the change in him was so thorough that when there was a talk of persecuting him, this uncle came to his rescue.

"The uncle not only refused to consent to his being beaten, but said that he himself would study the doctrine; and he was convinced of the truth of the religion that was able to work such a change in his nephew. Since then the uncle has shown clear evidence that he has become a child of God. Three other converts were the mother and wife of Mr. Wang's nephew, and also a youth who was formerly his companion in sin."

INTEMPERANCE.

S S. Lesson for May 21 Prov. 23: 29-35. Golden Text, Prov. 20: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE drunkard is a terrible object lesson. God says to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place, their Lord and ours: "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." The miserable drunkard destroys the body which is created and redeemed to be the dwelling place of God the Holy Ghost. Every man who destroys his own body by drink, by narcotics, tobacco, opium, etc., or by impurity, robs God the Holy Ghost, as well as himself; and God's unutterable sentence upon him while he lives in his sin is:

"Him Shall God Destroy."

His spiritual nature has no life, he quenches the Spirit by his sin: his affections are the slaves of his animal passions. He has lost control of his tongue, and says things which he neither wills nor knows, he has lost the power to direct his steps, and he goes whither he will not. His nerves are unstrung, his liver cannot act, the action of his heart is abnormal. Self-destroyed first, but more terrible still afterward, God-destroyed when the righteous God has set the seal of his righteous judgment on the wretched drunkard's abuse of the should-be-temple of God.

Who is to blame for the terrible intemperance that abounds? The moderate drinker looks down from his pedestal of pride that he can control himself and keep the dangerous enemy in check, and he blames the drunkard. The law of the country sides with such, and, while providing by its numerous licences, for places of temptation for the drunkard's easy fall, yet places him individually as soon as he is down, in the mire. Some blame the brewers and the distillers as the cause of the terrible curse. Some blame intoxicating liquors themselves, but there are other and quicker poisons which cannot hurt those who do not touch them. Some blame the government. It is an awful fact that in lands where the revenue is not obtained by the vices of the people, sensual vices do not obtain the ascendency in the same degree. But after all, what is it in the drunkard which makes him drink? The saloon? But other men can pass the saloon without going in to drink: why cannot he? Is it not his own lust which draws him away and entices him? (James 1: 14.) Has he really prayed the prayer with such belief in the living God that he can praise him for answering it even before he is tempted, "Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil."

There is no need for a man to become a drunkard if he will only flee to God to save him, and yield himself fully up to him. There is no need for a man who is a drunkard to continue so, if he will come with his temptation, and his sin, to a ready, waiting Saviour. If a drunkard is willing to be delivered, and at any cost, he will never find the Lord Jesus unwilling to deliver him. He who cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalen is also willing to cast out the devil of drink from any who really fly unto him for refuge, and learn the power and the value of his cleansing blood. The real cause of the drunkard's sin is not in the government, the saloon, or the drink itself, throne of our being, there is a Power over us which is "able even to subdue all things unto himself." (Phil. 3: 21.)

Some may argue that they have been changed from drunkards to sober men by sheer force of will, and without the grace of God. This is quite true, but in many such cases, we have grieved to see that enemy who was cast out, Jesus, "swept and garnished" has brought with him seven other spirits more wicked then himself who have entered in and dwelt there. (Matt. 12: 43-45.) We have seen in such the spirit of self-righteousness which despises the blood that bought us; the spirit of greed after money; the spirit of harsh judgment and contempt of those who are now what he once was, and other kindred spirits, which make him to savor more of the Pharisee than of the poor publican, and which cause him to be farther off from God than when he was a consciously lost, undone sinner. Many a drunkard, in his better moments, is kind and even generous to others who are in trouble, while the self-saved drunkard rarely is so.

Our golden text declares: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." Of course the question for the Christian is:

"Am I Right to Use Strong Drink?"

For the man or woman who comes under its power, the question is easily settled: "Can a man take fire into his bosom, and his clothes not be burned? Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?" (Prov. 6: 27, 28.) It is an awful thing, or wilful suicide, to tamper with a known foe, in yielding up the body to a power which enslaves. But then there are those who have power over their own will, and still better, who can trust the Lord Jesus to keep them; can it be wrong for such to use intoxicants? Let us answer by the truth which regulates the whole life of a true follower of Jesus: "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore, glorify God in your body and in your spirit which are God's." (1. Cor. 6: 19, 20.) Does a believing child of God, who knows the devastation which the drink is making in the bodies and souls of his fellow creatures, really make use of it to glorify God in his body and his spirit? "Christ died for all, that they which live should henceforth not live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." (II. Cor. 5: 15). Does a believing child of God use stimulants with a purely unselfish motive to benefit, not himself but others? "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." (Matt. 16: 22.) Does every child of God who uses intoxicating drinks, in his use of them deny himself or indulge himself, take up his cross or shirk his cross, follow Christ or follow his own desires?

How often the use of intoxicants by well known Christian men and women, to whom they had never been a snare, have encouraged weak brethren to whom they were a snare, and a terrible one, to take the steps which led to their final perdition! "Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block or in his brother's way." (Rom. 14: 13.) "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died." (Rom. 14: 15.) Thank God, we are not under the law as a schoolmaster, binding us to do this and not to do that, lest we die, but we are "within the law to Christ." As though, being one with Christ we could not have a thought or will consciously apart from him and his holy law. It is in such a spirit that we, as disciples, have the privilege to live. It is no longer a question of what I must do or must not do, nor yet of what I wish to do or not. It is a question of what my Lord wants done, that he may be glorified in me.

The passage chosen for our subject, is a vivid picture of the victims of liquor. Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? It does not need a skilful physician to detect these symptoms. Ask the drunkard's wife, or may be, the drunkard's husband; they will know. Ask the drunkard's child, and he will answer: "That is just like father." There are those who know a sorrow which shall be turned into joy; not so the drunkard. He is on an inclined plane, every woe hurries on a deeper woe, every sorrow a deeper sorrow, until at last it is irremediable, and he is lost! His life is all a dead loss; lost strength, lost health, lost reputation, lost self-respect, lost opportunities, lost salvation, lost heaven, a lost soul! "Wounds without cause," which have never been brought to the only Physician who could heal such!

"Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright." Look where, then? Off unto Jesus. Looking at the wine, or at any other occasion of temptation, blinds the eyes to him. "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey; his servants ye are to whom ye obey? How many have the idea that the "mocker" is a useful servant, but instead of making this powerful thing serve them, they find when it is too late they have been cherishing a serpent and an adder! And the result? Impurity; a loss of respect for true womanhood: "Thine eyes shall behold strange women." The sin of impurity goes hand in hand with other sensual sins, such as drunkenness, opium-eating, etc., and very generally lying follows in its wake. Then as it gets more and more possession, the brain reels and the reason becomes disordered. "Thine heart shall utter perverse things. Yea: thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast." Worse than the worst sea-sickness this indescribable horror of falling, drowning, and no help! The only hope of the miserable drunkard is to get more drink, "I will seek it yet again!" "They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me and I felt it not: when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

WHO hath woe? Out of every hundred paupers seventy-five are the result of intemperate habits; out of every hundred lunatics, eighty are the consequence of drink; of the women in the insane asylums, the great majority were sent there through the cruelty of drunken husbands. Seventy-five out of every hundred divorce cases are connected with the curse of rum, and ninety per cent. of the criminals now in our State prisons attribute their downfall to liquor, while no less than 120,000 men and women, each at some time in life some mother's darling, annually fill as many drunkards' graves. Surely the serpent is in the cup. It may be honey to the tongue, but it is gall to the heart. It may sparkle with the hues of the morning, but it shades the most promising prospects with all the gloom of night that knows the shining of no star, the breaking of no gladdening day.

Look not upon the wine. The advocates of moderation in the use of intoxicating drinks will get but little comfort out of God's Word, for not only does it denounce those who are given to drink but also those who put the cup to their neighbors' lips. Solomon's advice is "look not upon the wine." The advice of all good men is on the same line and even the drunkard, conscious of his enslavement and the degradation it entails, joins in the cry of warning. In total abstinence alone is safety, and unless you are in search of abject misery and eternal ruin, touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing.

Admiral Farragut one of the bravest of American naval heroes, and to whose memory a magnificent cold water fountain was dedicated some years ago on Union Square in New York City, told the following exceedingly interesting story of self-conquest. "When I was about ten years old, and when I accompanied my father as a cabin boy to New Orleans, with the little navy we then had, to look after the treason of Aaron Burr, I had some qualities that I thought made a man of me. I could swear like an old sailor, I could drink as strong a glass of grog as if I had sailed around Cape Horn, and could smoke like a locomotive. I was good at cards, and fond of gambling in every shape. At the close of the dinner, one day, my father turned everybody out of the cabin, locked the door and said to me, 'David what do you mean to be?' 'I mean to follow the sea!' 'Follow the sea! Yes, be a poor, miserable, drunken sailor before the mast, kicked and cuffed about the world, and die in some fever hospital in a foreign land?' 'No,' said I, 'I'll tread the quarter-deck and command, as you!' 'No, David, my boy; no boy ever trod the quarter-deck with such principles and habits as you have. You'll have to change your whole course of life if you ever expect to become a man.' My father left me and went on deck. I was stunned by the rebuke. A poor, miserable, drunken sailor before the mast; kicked and cuffed about the world, and to die in some fever-hospital! That's my fate, is it? I'll change my life and change it at once. I will never utter another oath; I will never drink another drop of intoxicating liquors; I will never gamble. And, as God is my witness, I have kept those three resolutions to this hour."

At last it biteth like a serpent. In one of the older universities of Massachusetts about forty years ago there was seen a youth of the highest promise, bearing an honored name and concentrating in his own intellect the moral power of two generations of his ancestors. He was a prodigy of learning. While others were plodding slowly through Xenophon, he would be reading the Greek tragedians with the greatest facility. He siezed a language almost by intuition. Called upon by the professors at the University to read dissertations on difficult and abstruse subjects, he would read from blank sheets, pouring forth arguments that thrilled while they convinced and charmed while they persuaded. His person was faultless; his hair like the raven's wing; his eye like the eagle's. On the day he received his degree he married one of the most beautiful girls in the vale that embosoms the college. His course was onward and upward. His profession, the law, led him to the highest office in the State. He was Attorney General at an age when most students are admitted to the bar. Suddenly, when as yet no one knew the cause, he resigned his high appointment, giving no reasons. But soon the facts leaked out. Slowly but surely the appetite for rum had enslaved him. He was a secret drunkard. His sense of honor was too high to entrust himself longer with the destinies of society. With horror we turn from the years of degradation that followed. He sank like a mighty ship in mid-ocean, though not without many a lurch, many a sign of striving earnestly once more to plough the proud seas that were destined to entomb him forever.

They have beaten me and I felt it not. Passing through a village one day, Mahomet was delighted at the merriment of a crowd of persons enjoying themselves with drinking at a wedding party; but being obliged to return by the same way the next morning, he was shocked to see the ground where they had been drenched with blood; and, asking the cause, he was told that the company had drunk to excess and getting into a brawl fell to slaughtering each other while stupidly drunk. From that day his mind was made up—the mandate went forth from Allah, that no child of the Faithful should touch wine, on pain of being shut out from Paradise.

ENLIGHTENING CHINESE WOMEN.

JUST one year ago I had the honor of opening in Penang, a city of one hundred and twenty-five thousand souls, what was then and is now the only school or mission school for natives, writes Rev. D. Davies Moore of Penang, in The Gospel in all Lands. It was called the Anglo-Chinese Girls' School. The Methodist Episcopal Mission had no lady worker on the ground, and that fact may partly account for the difficulty experienced for months in getting girls to come.

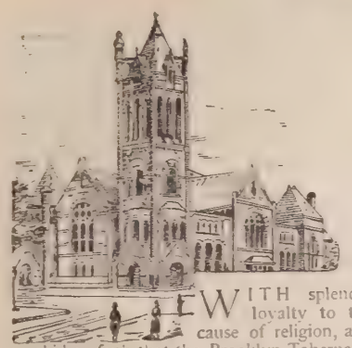
After six months of daily search for pupils, I was only able to report four girls at the annual meeting. But we are now seeing the fruit of our work in the changing attitude of many of the influential Baba Chinese toward female enlightenment. Our school roll at present registers twenty-eight, although some of these are very little boys coming with their sisters. Our teacher, an earnest Christian woman of this city, combines considerable zenana work with her duties as teacher. A definite part of each day is spent in Christian instruction and in learning Christian hymns, which they sing very sweetly. One of the mothers (they frequently visit the school) was present lately during the whole day. Our teacher felt a little afraid when she came to the hour of Bible teaching lest this novice would be so alarmed as to lead her own child and others from the school. But she did not hesitate.

The novice became more and more interested as the lesson went on. At its conclusion she arose, came up to the teacher's desk, and said very earnestly in Malay: "Mem, hamoak bark itu, walau sahnapanna anak horang dugar sama itu macham, pukol sama dia quot." For which an American mother would say: "Mam, that is first-class; if this child of mine does not attend to that sort of teaching, give it a sound thrashing."

Such incidents as these cheer our hearts. We perceive that the fear of our Christian teaching is growing less.

THE FUND STILL GROWING.

It Is Now Approaching $25,000, and the Rescue of the Tabernacle Is Almost Assured.



WITH splendid loyalty to the cause of religion, and an abiding faith that the Brooklyn Tabernacle is destined to do many years of future service in that sacred cause, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have come forward in increasing numbers during the past week, to help the relief movement. Their offerings to the Emergency Fund have been given with a spontaneous heartiness that makes them twice welcome. The rapidity with which friends in all parts of the Union are now responding to the Rev. Dr. Talmage's appeal argues well for the success of the fund.

In another column of this issue we give extracts from some of the letters received. Every mail brings many such, which we should like to print, did space permit.

The contributions to the Emergency Fund during the week have been as follows:

RELIGION AND WEATHER.

INIQUITY does not cease in summer-time. She never takes a vacation. The devil never leaves town. The child of want, living up that dark alley, has not so much fresh air nor sees as many flowers as in winter-time. In cold weather the frost blossoms on her window-pane, and the snow falls in wreaths in the alley. God pity the wretchedness that pants and sweats and festers and dies on the hot pavements and in the suffocating cellars of the town!

Let us remember that our exit from this world will more probably be in the summer than in any other season, and we cannot afford to die at a time when we are least alert and worshipful. At mid-summer the average of departures is larger than in cool weather. The sunstrokes, the dysenteries, the fevers, the choleras, have affinity for July and August. On the edge of summer, Death stands whetting his scythe for a great harvest. We are most careful to have our doors locked, and our windows fastened, and our "burglar alarm" set at times when thieves are most busy, and at a season of the year when diseases are most active in their burglaries of life, we need to be ready.

Our charge, therefore, is, make no adjournment of your religion till cool weather. Whether you stay in town, or seek the farm-house, or the seashore, or the mountains, be faithful in prayer, in Bible reading and in attendance upon Christian ordinances. He who throws away two months of life wastes that for which many a dying sinner would have been willing to give all his possessions when he found that the harvest was past and the summer was ended.

PICTURES OF HEAVEN.

HOMER'S heaven was an elysium which he describes as a plain at the end of the earth or beneath, with no snow nor rainfall, and the sun never goes down, and Rhadamanthus, the justest of men, rules. Hesiod's heaven is what he calls the islands of the blessed, in the midst of the ocean, three times a year blooming with most exquisite flowers, and the air is tinted with purple, while games and music and horse-races occupy the time. The Scandinavian's heaven was the hall of Valhalla, where the god Odin gave unending wine-suppers to earthly heroes and heroines. The Mohammedan's heaven passes its disciples in over the bridge Al-Sirat, which is finer than a hair and sharper than a sword, and then they are let loose into a riot of everlasting sensuality.

The American aborigines look forward to a heaven of illimitable hunting-ground, partridge and deer and wild duck more than plentiful, and the hounds never off the scent, and the guns never missing fire. But the geographer has followed the earth round, and found no Homer's elysium. Voyagers have traversed the deep in all directions, and found no Hesiod's islands of the blessed. The Mohammedan's celestial debauchery and the Indian's eternal hunting-ground for vast multitudes have no charm. But here rolls in the Bible heaven. No more sea—that is, no wide separation. No more night—that is, no insomnia. No more tears—that is, no heart-break. No more pain—that is, dismissal of lancet and bitter draught and miasma, and banishment of neuralgias and catalepsies and consumptions. All colors in the wall except gloomy black; all the music in the major-key, because celebrative and jubilant. River crystalline, gate crystalline, and skies crystalline, because everything is clear and without doubt. White robes, and that means sinlessness. Vials full of odors, and that means pure regalement of the senses. Rainbow, and that means the storm is over. Marriage supper, and that means gladdest festivity. Twelve manner of fruits, and that means luscious and unending variety. Harp, trumpet, grand march, anthem, amen, and hallelujah in the same orchestra. Choral meeting solo, and overture meeting antiphon, and strophe joining dithyramb, as they roll into the ocean of doxologies. And you and I may have all that, and have it forever through Christ, if we will let him with the blood of one wounded hand rub out sin, and with the other wounded hand swing open the shining portals.

INDOLENT PEOPLE.

IN some families there are persons of no practical service to the household or community; and though there are so many woes all around them in the world, they spend their time languishing over a new pattern, or bursting into tears at midnight over the story of some lover who had shot himself! They would not deign to look at Ruth carrying back the barley on her way home to her mother-in-law, Naomi. All this fastidiousness may seem to do very well while they are under the shelter of their father's house; but when the sharp winter of misfortune comes, what of these butterflies? Persons under indulgent parentage may get upon themselves habits of indolence; but when they come out into practical life their soul will recoil with disgust and chagrin. They will feel in their hearts what the poet so severely satirized when he said:

Folks are so awkward, things so impolite,
They're elegantly pained from morning until night.

Through that gate of indolence how many men and women have marched, useless on earth, to a destroyed eternity! Spinola said to Sir Horace Vere: "Of what did your brother die?" "Of having nothing to do," was the answer. "Ah!" said Spinola, "that's enough to kill any general of us." Oh! can it be possible in this world, where there is so much suffering to be alleviated, so much darkness to be enlightened, and so many burdens to be carried, that there is any person who cannot find anything to do?

Madame de Stael did a world of work in her time; and one day, while she was seated amid instruments of music, all of which she had mastered, and amid manuscript books which she had written, some one said to her: "How do you find time to attend to all these things?" "Oh," she replied, "these are not the things I am proud of. My chief boast is in the fact that I have seventeen trades, by any of which I could make a livelihood if necessary." And if in secular spheres there is so much to be done, in spiritual work how vast the field! How many dying all about us without one word of comfort! We want more Abigails, more Hannahs, more Rebeccas, more Marys, more Deborahs consecrated—body, mind, soul—to the Lord who bought them.

SIXTEEN AND TWENTY-FIVE.

THERE is no age in life when a woman can accomplish so much for Christ, I believe, as between sixteen and twenty-five. But now suppose those years have passed along and she has come to the afternoon of life, or to the eternal world, and she looks back and says: "O, how much sickness there was in that day in which I lived my girlhood life; how much sickness there was: and I never alleviated any of it. There were all those children that I might have picked out of the street fifteen years ago, but who are to-day in houses of abandonment because I did not, while they were in childhood, come to the rescue. There are twenty, thirty, forty years which I might have made tell for the welfare of the world which I then lived in, all gone for nothing and worse than nothing." Can you tell me any place dark enough for such a soul to weep in? "To think; there was that city, with scores of thousands of poor, wretched, suffering, groaning, bleeding, blaspheming, dying people; scores of them and scores of them, and thousands and thousands of them; and I lifted no hand of help, I uttered no word of comfort."

Oh, to crawl away into eternity without a crown or a plaudit, when you might have entered hailed by a bannered procession and a great shout from all the battlements. I would to God that all the young women of this land might rise up in soul to day, and say: "Oh Lord, here I am for time and eternity. If there is anything in my arm, anything in my look, anything in my soul, anything in my vivacity, it is all thine and thine forever."

Worldliness and frivolity may seem to do very well while the lustre is in the eye, and the flush is on the cheek, and the gracefulness is in the gait; but when years and trouble have clipped off these embellishments, what a life to think of! Oh, if there be nothing to remember but flowers that faded, and splendid apparel that is worn out, and brilliant groups that are scattered! When the trinkets are all gone; when the gay feet have halted; when the revel is done—what then? What then?

SMOOTH TALK.

FLATTERERS are ever false. Yet flattery in one form or another is grateful to nearly all. Many people like to have their qualities appreciated, but more like to have them overestimated. Self-conceit invites the language of adulation, and in turn exaggerates the meaning of complimentary words. It is always dangerous to place a proper self-respect at the mercy of those who will flatter for their own ends:

True dignity resides with him alone,
Who in the secret hour of sober thought
Can still suspect and still revere himself
As man.

When, however flattery rules the pulpit, and preachers of the Gospel prophesy smooth things because the people like to have it so, then the beguilement of words is Satanic in spirit and in effect.

The Gospel is a discovery of man to himself. It is intended to let him see the plague of his own soul. It holds up the mirror to nature as it is. But is there not much of so-called preaching in our day which ignores human depravity, apologizes for wrong-doing as an infirmity, and makes small account of the deceitfulness of sin while it prates of the dignity and capability of human nature?

We believe that a successful pulpit will tell the truth plainly in love. It will not handle the Word of God deceitfully. It will not keep back the "hard sayings" lest they should prove distasteful. The Gospel is gentle, but it is also honest.

PRAYERS WITH THEIR GIFTS.

Some of the Letters Sent to the Tabernacle Emergency Fund.

AMONG the hundreds of letters received during the week, relating to the Tabernacle Emergency Fund, are many that contain expressions at once so fervent and touching that we cannot pass them without remark. Some are like prayers rising to heaven for the rescue of the Tabernacle from the impending danger; others like strong blasts from the trumpet of faith, sounding aloud the conviction that God will not allow his work to fail and that the great Protestant temple will be saved by his power, and by the prayers and generosity of his people. "May God keep the church from being delivered into the hands of sinners," writes Allen J. Reeves of Pleasantdale, Neb., and this sentiment, coming from a far distant state, finds a thousand echoes. "I want to see the Tabernacle free from debt, and stand alone for the cause of Christ and his work only," writes H. L. Dring of Boston. R. J.

"Not Ashamed."

H., Algona, Iowa, writes: "If you will reverse the saying of old and put it 'I can work for the Master and to beg I am not ashamed,' we will not only believe both statements, but every dollar will be raised to pay off that debt. May God preserve the new Tabernacle and so bless you that your last days may be your best days, and that your sun may not go down behind the darkened West, but melt away into the brightness of heaven."

Mrs. E. D. Williams, Utica, says: "To-day an old soldier friend called on me—a soldier of the late war—a soldier of the Cross. Not liking to have so great a calamity befall, as that the temple, which is dedicated to God should go into worldliness, he gave me this bill ($2) which I enclose. I attended the Brooklyn Tabernacle once and shall never forget the singing. As I entered they were singing, 'Pass me not, O Gentle Saviour,' in a manner such as I never heard it sung before. If the debt is raised, I think it would be grand to be where I could listen to the praises that will come from the audience."

Instances of Self-Denial.

Mrs. C. H. Downing, Round Lake, sets an example of self-denial when, in forwarding her contribution ($7) she writes: "I think I will enjoy the wearing of my old bonnet another year and give the money to continue the glorious work Dr. Talmage has been carrying forward in the name of the Lord so many years. My heart was carried heavenward in the singing of every time I went to that house. I found the Lord was in his holy temple. It has been blessed to many as well as to myself."

Joy to the world, the Lord has come

Even the little children are doing what they can for the sake of him who so greatly loved the little ones while he sojourned on earth. Was there ever a purer, sweeter spirit of childish faith and consecration than this letter discloses? Earnest Zea, Rensselaer, Ind., writes:

A Poor Boy's Offering.

"I do not know whether you ever receive letters from children. I am blind and a cripple; cannot walk or see. I could see and walk, too, once; but when I was eighteen months old I had spinal fever, and ever since have had to creep around on my hands and knees. I am now eleven, but I am happy and know God will make it all right in the end. Perhaps I am one of his chosen to suffer. I can play on the organ. The first piece I ever learned was 'Jesus Lover of My Soul.' I do not go to Sabbath School very often, but mamma reads me nice stories. She told me the story of Nehemiah, how he went to Jerusalem to help build up the broken walls, and I committed it to memory. I will send twenty-five cents in stamps to help pay the debt on Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle. It is so little I am ashamed to send it; but the Bible teaches us to commence with the littles."

Mrs. J. K. Macomber, New York City, $2, writes, "I am a poor woman and have not a great insight into business matters, but I have an impression that money will flow in for the Emergency Fund until you will be obliged to say stop."

W. H. Kearn, Red Hill, Pa., $2, writes, "This is a work of God, and you can feel assured that the Tabernacle will not fall into the hands of Satan."

Mrs. M. K. Sanderson, Detroit, Mich., $1., says: "If ever I wish I was rich, it is at such a call. I do not feel it to be a gift, in one sense, so much do I receive every week from your sermons."

Charles A. Taylor and Kate Taylor, Brockton, Mass., $2. "Our prayer is that God may bless and continue the good work of Dr. Talmage and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

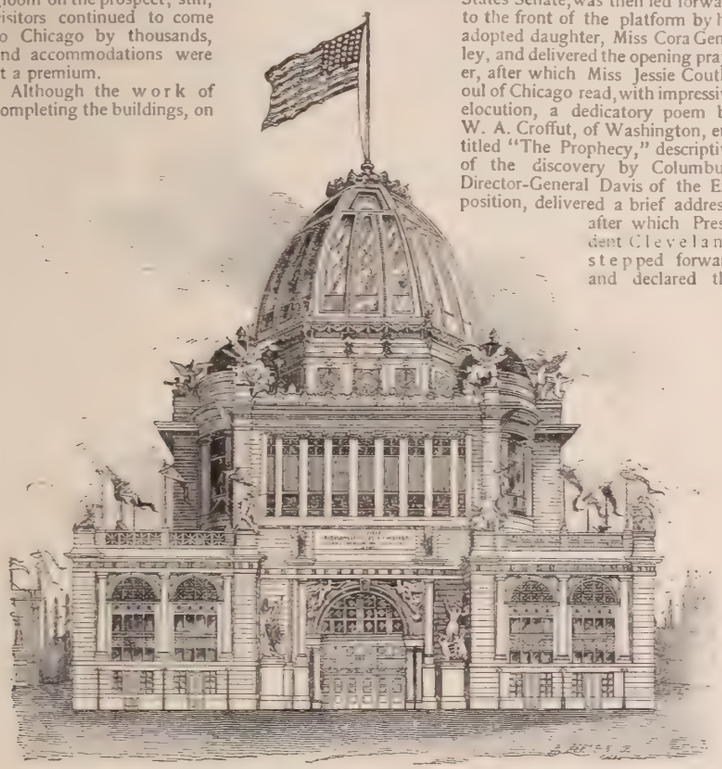
THE WORLD'S FAIR OPENED.

A Great International Event Fitly Celebrated—How the Fair Looked to Visitors—Mr. Cleveland's Pressure of the Button moves the Wheels and Sets Flags and Banners Flying.

MONDAY, May 1st, was an auspicious day in Chicago—"the White City by the Lakes"—when the World's Columbian Exposition was duly opened according to programme. For several days the weather had been wet and disagreeable, casting somewhat of a gloom on the prospect; still, visitors continued to come to Chicago by thousands, and accommodations were at a premium.

Although the work of completing the buildings, on which a vast army of mechanics and laborers have been industriously engaged for many months, was still far from complete, they were sufficiently advanced to allow of the opening ceremonies taking place on the day appointed. The programme was an elaborate one, and was faithfully carried out. Hours before the time set for the exercises to begin, a vast multitude congregated in the neighborhood of the Administration Building. A platform had been erected extending across the entire front of the building, and this was decorated with flags and bunting. President Cleveland, the members of the Cabinet, Judges of the Supreme Court and other high officials in the National Government, together with many officials connected with the management of the Fair, the Chicago City authorities, etc., proceeded in carriages to the Fair grounds at Jackson Park. They were preceded by a platoon of mounted park police, following which was a body of mounted city police and troops of cavalry and infantry. In one carriage were President Cleveland, President T. W. Palmer of the Columbian Exposition, and H. N. Higinbotham. In another were Vice-President Stevenson, and two Exposition ex-Presidents, Messrs. Gage and Baker. In the next carriage were the Duke of Veragua, ex-President Waller of Connecticut, Commander Dickins of the United States Navy, and first Vice-President of the Exposition F. W. Peck. Following the Duke's carriage came one containing the Duchess of Veragua, Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Commander Dickins. The family of the Duke followed in other carriages, and after them came vehicles containing the Ambassadors, the Mayor and municipal authorities of Chicago and distinguished guests. The start was made from the Lexington Hotel, where President Cleveland had his headquarters. Marching past the decorated mansions on Michigan Avenue and along the Grand Boulevard, the long column filed down the Midway Plaisance and thence up Central Avenue into Jackson Park, where the Presidential party and other prominent guests entered the Administration Building and passed out upon the great platform overlooking the immense square, which was densely packed with a multitude of spectators.

In a special stand, on the centre of the platform, President Cleveland, Vice-President Stevenson, the Duke of Veragua and party, and a number of high officials were stationed, and immediately behind them were the sections assigned to the Diplomatic Corps, leading officials and prominent guests, the orchestra of 600 pieces being in the rear of all. As the orchestra played the "Columbian March," a wave of enthusiasm passed over the great throng that faced the President. Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind Chaplain of the United States Senate, was then led forward to the front of the platform by his adopted daughter, Miss Cora Gemley, and delivered the opening prayer, after which Miss Jessie Couthoul of Chicago read, with impressive elocution, a dedicatory poem by W. A. Croffut, of Washington, entitled "The Prophecy," descriptive of the discovery by Columbus. Director-General Davis of the Exposition, delivered a brief address, after which President Cleveland stepped forward and declared the World's Fair Exposition formally opened. During his remarks, he said:



THE ADMINISTRATION BUILDING AT THE WORLD'S FAIR, CHICAGO.

"We who believe that popular education and the stimulation of the best impulses of our citizens lead the way to a realization of the National destiny which our faith promises, gladly welcome the opportunity here afforded us to see the results accomplished by efforts which have been exerted longer than ours in the field of man's improvements; while in appreciative return we exhibit the unparalleled advancement and wonderful accomplishments of a young nation, and present the triumphs of a vigorous, self-reliant and independent people.

"We have built these splendid edifices, but we have also built the magnificent fabric of a popular Government, whose grand proportions are seen throughout the world. We have made and have gathered together objects of use and beauty, the products of American skill and invention; we have also made men who rule themselves." He added:

It is an exalted mission in which we and our guests from other lands are engaged, as we co-operate in the inauguration of an enterprise devoted to human enlightenment; and in the undertaking we here enter upon, we exemplify in the noblest sense the brotherhood of nations.

Let us hold fast to the meaning that underlies this ceremony, and let us not lose the impressiveness of this moment. As by a touch the machinery that gives life to this vast Exposition is now set in motion, so at the same instant let our hopes and aspirations awaken forces which in all time to come shall influence the welfare, the dignity and the freedom of mankind.

The President then turned to a table on the left, on which was the electric button connected with the machinery. Pressing its tiny surface with a single finger, he looked toward the great throng and at the same moment a deafening cheer went up from tens of thousands of throats, the orchestra broke into the "Hallelujah Chorus," the wheels of the great engine in Machinery Hall began to revolve, the electric fountains in the lagoon tossed their torrents skywards, water gushed through all the fountains in the different parts of the Fair grounds filling the basins, and the sound of machinery, the thunder of artillery salutes from the vessels on the lake, the chimes from the great bells in Manufactures Hall all mingled together in deafening yet melodious acclaim. Nearly one thousand flags and banners were unfurled as if by magic at the same moment, and the opening of the Columbian Exposition to the world was a thing accomplished.

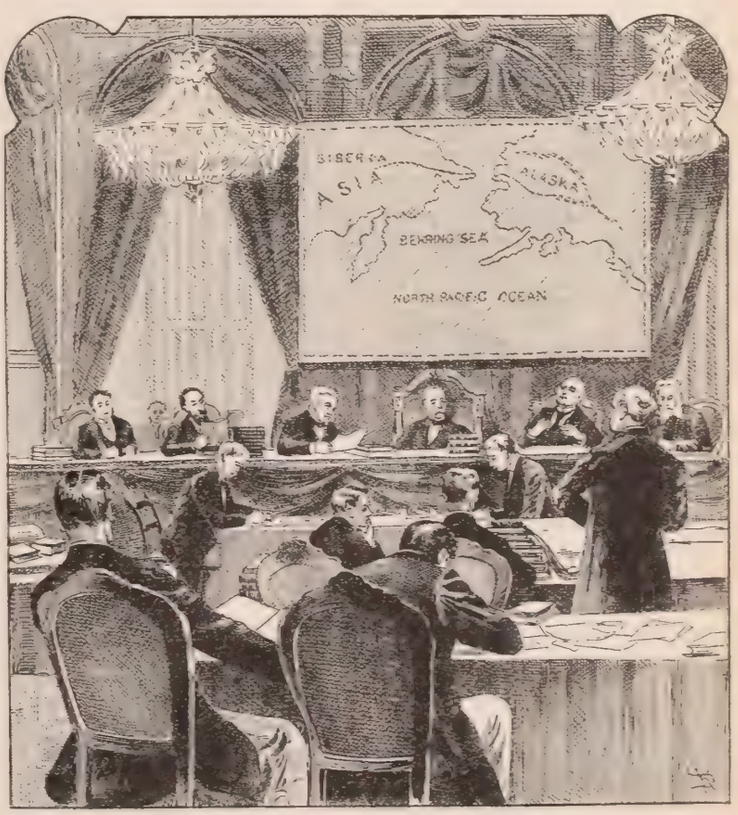
The condition of the Fair, despite all drawbacks, was a source of general satisfaction. In the Agricultural Building, everything was in excellent shape, and many of the exhibits were complete, notably those of New York and Wisconsin and the Canadian exhibit. In the Manufactures Building, much still remained to be done; in the Electricity Building, domestic exhibitors made a magnificent display, and the Mines and Mining Building was a realm of wonder and delight, the German, Canadian, Australian, Egyptian, Chilian and British exhibits being already complete. Machinery Hall will still require a good deal of work before it is in perfect shape. Transportation Hall has many fine displays, but there are numerous places yet to fill; the Horticultural Building is in a somewhat similar condition of incompleteness, and the Art Palace is the same, especially as to the main gallery, where the display is promised to be specially fine. Satisfactory progress has been made in the Fisheries and Government Buildings.

The buildings of the different States are in various stages of incompleteness, and among those erected by the foreign governments, Japan, Germany and England are furthest advanced.

The southern end of Jackson Park presents a chaotic appearance, being covered with buildings in various stages of erection, some little more than started. It is stated by the Fair Managers, however, that at the present rate of progress, very little time will be necessary to complete every building on the grounds, and that long before the end of the present month, the Fair will be in perfect condition, with every exhibit displayed to the best advantage.

THE BEHRING SEA DISPUTE.

On this page we give an illustration of the Court of Arbitration, now sitting in Paris for the consideration of the Behring Sea fishery question. Thus far, much of the time of the Court has been consumed in discussing the admission of certain supplementary evidence on the part of Britain, and the main subjects to come before it have not been reached. In this country, British Columbia, and England, the sessions of the Court are watched with keen interest. Meanwhile the customary precautions against invading American rights in Behring Sea have been taken, and the President has issued the usual proclamation prohibiting the capture of fur-bearing animals. Several steamers are now patrolling the entrance to the Sea and keeping a sharp look-out for poachers. The Canadian sealing fleet, which returned to Newfoundland lately, reported the worst season in thirty years. It is expected that the Court of Arbitration's sittings will be protracted probably until the end of 1893.



THE BEHRING SEA COURT OF ARBITRATION AT PARIS.

Signed it With His Blood.

How a Young Japanese Convert Pledged Himself to Christianity.

REV. J. W. WADMAN, missionary at Hirosaki, Japan, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: A few weeks ago we went to a railroad town quite distant and opened up some services for the first time in that large city. Crowds came to hear the glad tidings and listened very attentively. Even two or three Buddhist Priests were among the number, and remained to the close of each service. We believed a good impression prevailed, and were not disappointed in our hope and prayer, as will be seen. The last night we were there five bright, intelligent well-to-do young men came to our little hotel and desired to have a conversation about what we had been talking of night after night. They stayed until three o'clock in the morning and were deeply impressed. Among other things spoke of was the promise of Christ to pardon and keep a man from all sin, even from wine and tobacco.

At this point they all became greatly interested and while they had never heard the like before from any of their religious teachers, yet they felt that it was all true and they wished to signify in some way their desire to forsake such sin and live Christian lives.

A pledge was suggested and so we wrote one in due form and after earnest prayer to God for his blessing, these young men began to sign it and we could see by their manner that they meant it with all their heart. At last it came the turn of one quiet young fellow to put his name and stamp to the paper, and before doing so, he deliberately rolled up his sleeve, took his knife and gashed his arm until the red blood flowed quite profusely! It was rather a startling sight and one never to be forgotten. The look of determination on that young man's face was something not to be often seen. Dipping his stamp in the blood he applied it to the paper and thus, according to a very old Japanese custom, now almost extinct, signified the sacrifice of life itself rather than the violation of the pledge. Think of that! Here is surely the stuff martyrs are made of; and when it is told that this same young man, together with the others, is now reading the Bible and seeking after the truth as it is in Jesus, our friends will have an idea of the foundation upon which the infant church of Japan is being built.

Oh! let all the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pray earnestly for Japan! Pray that these 40,000,000 souls may yet and speedily rise up out of the dim "Light of Asia" into the glorious light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

J. W. WADMAN.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE NEW CREATION.

A Sermon Preached last Sunday, May 7, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D. Text: "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; Behold, all things are become new." II. Cor. 5: 17.

THE chapter from which this text is taken ought not to have been separated from that which precedes it. We know that the division of the Bible into chapters and verses is the work of man and not of God; and we know also that it is a work which often was very imperfectly performed. This chapter is so closely connected in thought with the preceding that it is really an inseparable part of that discussion. In the previous chapter we have as the main subject some of the characteristics and work of the ministry. The fidelity and honesty with which the apostle Paul and those associated with him labored, as well as the dangers which they incurred and the consolations which they enjoyed, these form the heart of the discussion. In the present chapter we have a full explanation of the motives and comforts of the ministry. Few chapters in the Bible so abound in exquisite beauties of thought and expression. The Word of God might well be studied for its rhetorical beauty and for its intellectual stimulus, apart from its spiritual truths.

Coming to the text itself we have, in the first place, a condition affirmed—"If any man be in Christ." This form of expression is Pauline to an unusual degree. You will remember that he uses it with great frequency and in a variety of connections. We have such expressions as these: "the heavenly places in Christ;" "he chose us in him;" "bestowed on us in the beloved;" "in him we have our redemption;"

"The Good Pleasure

which he purposed in him;" "to sum up all these things in Christ;" "in him, I say;" "in him also we were made a heritage;" "we who had before hoped in Christ;" "in him also ye having heard the word of truth." Such expressions as these and "in himself," "in Christ," etc., occur, it is said, one hundred and seventy-six times in Paul's epistles, and thirty-six times in the epistle of the Ephesians alone.

This is certainly a remarkable phrase, a profound formula, a subtle expression, involving a meaning deeper than human language can fathom. This expression sets forth Jesus Christ as the atmosphere in which the believer moves, as the source whence his life comes, as the root of his character, as the controlling influence of his life, as the arena of all his activity, as the object of his love and as the goal of his desire. It represents Christ as the believer's spiritual home, in a word, as his all and in all.

Christ is the sustenance by which the believer lives, and he is born from above. He is then a new creature and possesses a new nature. His will is changed; his understanding is illumined and his heart is inspired. Christ becomes the centre of his entire being and Christ's will the law of his life. These expressions thus denote the closest and most intimate union and communion. The life of the believer and the life of the Lord becomes one life. The union is such that Christ can best represent it by the union between the vine and its branches. Only as we thus abide in Christ and he in us can we become fruitful, or even retain our spiritual existence. Believers are now partakers with Christ in his sufferings; and they shall at last be partners with him in glory.

This relationship is set forth both by the baptismal act and formula. The formula properly translated is not, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," but "into" the name of the persons of the blessed Trinity. This change in the form of the preposition is profoundly significant, and it is of great importance that the formula should be properly given. In this connection would a meaning in reference to the name, or by the authority of the trinity. But into suggests more than relationship to or by the authority of; it sets forth identity in character, union in being, and unity in purpose and life. It involves an allegiance to and a fellowship with the triune God which are peculiarly tender solemn, beautiful and divine. The thought of the formula is in harmony with the significance of the act of baptism. Baptism sets forth a death, a burial and a resurrection. The external act symbolizes a profound internal experience of death to self and sin, of partnership with the new life that is and of a resurrection to walk in newness of life before men. Most significant spiritual truths are thus taught by the Pauline expression, "in Christ." May God help all believers to come into a deeply spiritual realization of the significance of their communion with Jesus Christ! May God help us to realize that we are, with absolute literality, partakers of the divine nature!

But all men are not in Christ Jesus, are not united to him in life, purpose and destiny. Many are openly or secretly opposed to Jesus Christ. The Scriptures everywhere recognize these two classes of men. Under manifold figures this idea is again and again emphasized. It is deeply solemn that while one class of men are in Christ Jesus, with all the fullness of meaning which the phrase implies, another class of men are opposed to Jesus Christ, with all the solemnity in life and destiny which this opposition includes. The Word of God represents the race as sheep that are lost and sheep that are found, as those who have joyfully accepted or those who have rudely refused the gracious invitation of the divine host to a princely feast. We have the five virgins who were conspicuously wise and the five who were hopelessly foolish; and in the august picture of the great day with its white throne, its divine Judge and its assembled hosts, we have the goats on the left hand, while the sheep are on the right. A deep solemnity attaches to these positive affirmations and parabolic representations. We also in the same divine record read of those who are dead, and who are sharply distinguished from those who have been quickened; of those who were in darkness, but who have been translated into those who are distinctly called the children of God, and of others described as the children of wrath and of the devil; we also read of those who are not condemned, and sadly of those who are condemned already. All have gone astray, but some have gratefully returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls; some were once afar off, but are now made nigh by the precious blood of Jesus Christ. You are to-day either in Christ or out of Christ. There is no alternative; there is no middle ground. You are either with and for Christ or against him. If you are against him, rejecting the offers of his love, and refusing the invitations of his grace, he must at least banish you, because you first banished yourself from his glorious presence. If you are in Christ, you are now a sharer in his strength, blessedness and joy, and at the last you shall be a partaker of his fulness, felicity and glory. No matter what character men formerly possessed, if they are in Christ Jesus they are candidates for glory, and will be sharers in eternal blessedness.

We notice, in the second place, the character affirmed of the man who is in Christ Jesus—"He is a new creature." The literal translation of the phrase is a new creation. Frequently in the New Testament the word which is here translated creature means creation. It denotes the act of creating, and also the thing thus created. It is sometimes applied to the universe in general, and sometimes and especially to mankind. We have the words, "The new man which after Christ is created in righteousness and true holiness." The great truth here taught is that the new character manifested by believers is so different from that which they formerly possessed and exhibited, that no change less than a new creation can account for the difference. The change is so great that the man may properly be described as made over again, and thus as having become a new man. There is in every true conversion a manifestation of divine power as truly as in the creation of the world itself. The old man is not patched up and mended; the old man dies and is buried and a new man created in Christ Jesus comes forth as if from the tomb of a dead man. This new man shows his newness by possessing new views, by manifesting new desires, by being governed by new motives and animated by new aims and hopes. Christ is confessedly and joyfully enthroned in the centre of his soul; self is joyously and Completely Dethroned.

Many who are truly converted cannot lay their finger on the exact date of the birth of this new life in their soul. It came gradually as the rising sun, scattering the clouds of night and illumining the earth with its radiant beauty and its dazzling splendors; but there is a date; there is a time in God's knowledge when the line was crossed and when the new life was begun. God knows the moment of death, of creation, and of resurrection. It is not necessary to the genuineness of our conversion that in all cases we should know the exact moment of the death of the old man and of the birth of the new man. Death is death; and life is life. To transmute death into life requires an exertion of divine power as truly as did the raising of the daughter of Jairus, the son of the widow of Nain, or the brother of Martha and Mary. In the mind of God there must be a moment when that divine power is exerted and when the new life is begun. There is really no shading of death into life, but the chasm separating the two is instantaneously crossed in Christ's knowledge.

The Process of Dying

may indeed be greatly prolonged, but there is a moment of life, and another when the spirit takes its flight and the man is dead. The process of living may be prolonged, as far as the development of this life is concerned; but there is a moment when it begins, a moment when a man by personal faith comes into touch with Jesus Christ, the author of life, and that moment the man so believing has life in himself. These statements are in harmony both with the teachings of the Word of God and with the experience of many believers.

Language such as is used in this text is common among all nations to describe great changes in human experience and condition. Among the Jews conversion of a man from idolatry and wickedness was often denominated a new creation. All men readily understand the force of language such as is here employed. Men are ever ready to quibble with the language of Scripture, although they find no difficulty in understanding similar forms of expression when applied to matters of worldly experience. The reality of this new creation is always seen where it has actually taken place. The man who formerly was a child of Satan now shows by his changed life that he is a child of God. He who formerly was a slave of sin is now victorious over sin and has his fruit unto holiness. The man who formerly was controlled by pride is now meek and humble. The man who once lived for this life alone now has his portion in God, and looks not simply at the things that are seen, but at those which are unseen and eternal. The man who was a drunkard becomes sober and again resumes his place in the family and in the walks of business life. The man whose life was grossly impure husband, and man. Every pastor has witnessed just such transformations as these. There are miracles of divine grace occurring now which are not less miraculous and divine than were the miracles of feeding the hungry, healing the sick, and raising the dead performed by our Lord during his earthly ministry. If a man denies the existence and operation of divine grace in the conversion of souls and in the transformation of life and character, we can safely challege him to account for these marvelous transformations which are constantly occurring. No other moral change takes place on the earth which is so deep and radical as pastors frequently see and joyously welcome. How can we account for the change of Saul the violent persecutor into Paul the consecrated disciple, if we deny the presence and omnipotence of divine and almighty grace? God be thanked for the power which works such miracles, which transforms lost men into happy believers.

We ought to emphasize, in the third place, the universality of the change set forth—"Old things are passed away: behold, all things are become new." This is a broad and sweeping statement; but it is no broader than the experience of thousands justifies. The change in the case of many Jews was as great as this strong language would imply. Their former prejudices against Christ and Christianity were entirely destroyed; and their attachment to the faith of their fathers utterly ceased. They no longer trusted in the rites and ceremonies of Judaism for their eternal salvation; and they learned to love all who loved Jesus as their brethren whatever may have been their former condition, or whatever was their nationality. How wonderful was the transforming power of God's grace, which could remove the deep-seated prejudices from the minds of Jews toward Gentiles, and Gentiles toward Jews in that early day! Gentiles were, perhaps, as much under the influence of this prejudice as were the Jews themselves; but they were willing to abandon it under the influence of this new light and love They gave up their degrading idolatries and received Christ as the only hope for Lost Men and Women.

Christianity alone truly teaches the great lessons of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men. Christianity is not the religion of any one country or century, or any race or condition. All other religions were ethnic, tribal, or at most, national; but Christianity was suited to, needed by, and intended for all classes and conditions of men, in all countries and at all timss. It alone aimed to conquer the world; that conquest is its divine destiny and its exalted purpose. Toward the attainment of that end it is moving forward with rapid strides, increasing energy, and multiplying assurances of success.

The truth taught here regarding the passing away of old things, and the becoming new of all things, is a truth which all truly converted men and women fully endorse. Their whole conception of life and duty is changed. In the heart of all unconverted men self in some form rules; the last analysis of sin clearly shows that it is some form of selfishness. But now the supreme love of self has passed away; the love of the world has ceased to be dominant; the love of Christ now constrains, energizes, and inspires every faculty of the soul and every activity of the body. The love of earthly friends is sweetened, ennobled and purified, and it is subordinate to the all-controlling love of Jesus Christ. The Christian is now consecrated to higher and holier objects than selfish pursuits. The imagination feels the uplifting touch of Christ's presence, and it is henceforth used for the exaltation of life and

For the Glory of God.

The Bible also is a new book. A new meaning is found in its old words. Texts often repeated are now throbbing with new life and radiant with heavenly glory. God is now a new Being to his new-born child. He is no longer merely the Creator of the universe, but is a personal friend and a reconciled Father. Fellowship with God is heaven begun. A new love for all mankind is often found in the heart of the new creature in Christ Jesus. Only a man possessed of divine love can be a true philanthropist. Christ was the Son of man as well as the Son of God. He was the head of a new race. He is the author of a new creation. Only as we catch his spirit can we live over again his life. The great Chalmers preached for years before he knew fully what it is to be a New Creature in Christ Jesus.

When he came forth from the room in which this experience came into his soul, a new life was in his heart, a new light in his eye, and a fresh eloquence on his tongue. The people marveled at the change which had taken place in his preaching. No longer did they hear formal essays, but glowing exhortations, thrilling experiences, and irresistible invitations.

Every new creature in Christ Jesus has also new hopes for the future. This earthly life is now for the first time rightly understood; it is simply the vestibule of a higher and nobler life. He who lives for this world alone does not truly live even for this world; he has missed life's true meaning and highest glory. The man who lives for the world to come wins both the life that now is and that which is to be. In such a man's heart and on his lips there are even now the first notes of a new song which will be sung in its fulness and blessedness of the new heavens and the new earth. Let us prove that we are new creatures in Christ Jesus by living the Christ life here and now. Come now to his feet and to his heart; die to self and sin that you may live to Christ and for heaven!

BEN.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

HAVE you heard the story of Ben? My lips have told it so often, that I think it but fair that my pen should tell it once.

He was as crooked and straight a specimen of humanity as you could find anywhere. His body was crooked, but his soul was straight—an arrangement he much preferred to a crooked soul in a straight body. His back was broken, but his soul had been made whole. His body reminded you of a scrub oak, but his soul resembled a tall cedar in Lebanon; the one excited your pity,—the other your admiration. His body made you ache with sympathy, but his soul made you long to be like him. His face—ah, his face! While his crooked body made you think of midnight and darkness, his face reminded you of noon-day and sunshine. It was a beautiful face, with peace written all over it. The forehead was the frontal of good thoughts, and the curves of his lips were gentleness and good-will. The ever-present smile reminded you that "the peace that passeth all understanding" could evolve sunshine out of physical suffering, and prepared you to hear him frequently sing, "There is sunshine in my soul to-day." If the eyes be the windows of the soul, never did a soul have more beautiful windows to look out of. They were large and expressive, bright and blue, and beamed with kindness and trust. The soul never uttered a word nor gave a look of complaint, but you could not help feeling it was greatly cramped for room. It made the best of the crooked house in which it lived, but that it sometimes longed to move out, you could discover when you saw Ben reading from the Book of books, "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." A peculiar longing would flash out from his eyes, and his face fairly glowed with delight, as he turned back the pages and read: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am ye may be also."

From his mother he inherited his beautiful face and his gentle spirit, and his advent in the home was a benediction. His broken back came from his father, though Ben would never admit it. Crazed by drink, the father came home one night, and when his seven-year old boy ran to greet him, with one kick he broke Ben's back and his wife's heart. The wife never forgave him, but Ben never blamed him. The little fellow's cry of pain sobered the man forever, while the broken back stood out as a forcible protest against the assertion "if you leave drink alone, it will leave you alone." His body never grew a particle after that, while his soul never before grew so fast. After the first few weeks of suffering, whatever of pain he felt, he kept to himself, and his gentlest look and brightest smile, he kept for his father; for it was a question as to whether the mental suffering of the man was not far greater than the physical suffering of the boy. Ben seemed to realize this, and to help his father became his daily task.

His love for sunshine, flowers and music was intense, for in them he found helps in the development of his soul. He seemed to be supremely happy, when through the large window came streams of sunshine, and on the stand were fragrant flowers, while he sang with exquisite sweetness:

> Dear Saviour, let thy watchful eye,
> Protect me day by day;
> That from the precious fold I love,
> My feet may never stray.
> Make me humble, loving, dutiful,
> Make thy way within me beautiful;
> Keep my heart from sin,
> Let no stranger in.

To those who do not know the wonderful power of grace, it was marvelous how the little fellow's soul grew in the next seven years; and to those who watched him closely, it was plain he would soon be compelled to move out of that body, so distorted by that cruel kick. But his faith grew stronger as his limbs grew weaker, and the nearer he came to eternity, the brighter became his face.

As time faded, but one thing troubled him, and that was: Who was to blame for his broken back? He reasoned it out in this wise: "If it was right for men to vote to license the sale of drink, it was right for men to sell it; if it was right for men to sell it, it was right for men to drink it; and if it was right for men to drink it, it was right for boys to have their backs broken by those who were under the influence of drink." So ran his logic, and it was terrible in its truth. Ben with his broken back lay under his father, and the father under the seller of the drink, and the seller under the license system, and the voters for the system were on the top of the heap. So, for awhile it troubled him, until he remembered that eternity would reveal the mysteries of this life; then he contentedly dismissed the problem, with the remark, "It may be that God wanted my back to be broken, but if he didn't, then it will be found that papa was not to blame."

It was a bright spring day when Ben moved out of his crooked house into one of the Father's many mansions. The cheeks of the watchers were wet with tears, but the face of the little fellow was radiant with "the coming glory." He had ripened fast during the seven years in that crooked body, and the Father's call to move out and up found him ready. With a bright smile and the cry of "Here!" he swept through the gates into the eternal city. Ben has gone to his rest, but the problem as to who was responsible for his broken back, yet remains to be solved.

A WORTHY PROJECT.

A friend of the poor in New York has placed at the disposal of the Charity Organization Society ten acres of land on an island in Long Island Sound, within three miles of Stamford, Conn., for any church or society which will use it for fresh-air excursions. There is excellent boating, bathing and fishing, and all that is needed is for some society to erect a suitable building and transport its needy friends to the place for a few weeks' sojourn during the summer months.

HE KNOWS.

I CANNOT think but God must know
About the things I long for so;
I know he is so good, so kind,
I cannot think but He will find
Some way to help, some way to show
Me to the thing I long for so.

I stretch my hand—it lies so near;
It looks so sweet, it looks so dear.
"Dear Lord," I pray, "O, let me know
If it is wrong to want it so!"

He only smiles—he does not speak;
My heart grows weaker and more weak
With looking at the thing so dear
Which lies so far, and yet so near.

Now, Lord, I leave at Thy loved feet
This thing which looks so near, so sweet;
I will not seek, I will not long—
I almost fear I have been wrong.

I'll go and work the harder, Lord,
And wait till by some loud, clear word
Thou callest me to Thy loved feet
To take the thing so dear, so sweet.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Ellie Schedler, Turbeville, Pa. 1. What was the length, height and thickness of the wall of ancient Jerusalem? 2. How many gates were in the walls, and what were their names, and why were they so called?

1. The first or old wall was ten cubits thick and twenty-five high; its length is not known. The second or middle wall, and the third or outer wall were nearly of the same dimensions. 2. As to the number and names of the gates of ancient Jerusalem, we may depend on the 3rd chapter of Nehemiah; thus we find seven gates which are: the Sheep gate, Fish gate, Old gate, Dung gate, Fountain gate, Water gate, and Miphkad gate. The names of the gates were changed with the changes that fell upon ancient Jerusalem.

A Reader, West Orange, N. J. What is a shekel, a measure, a cubit and a mite?

A shekel was in ancient times a piece of money, equal to 224 grains, corresponding with 8 pennies which are about one-half of an ounce. A measure is the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek terms denoting a specific length or capacity; a cubit, immediately derived from the Latin cubitus, means the lower arm, about 19 inches; it was used in ancient times as a measure of the human body being the length from the elbow to the extremity of the longest finger; and a mite was a coin, thin like a scale. In Mark 12: 42 we learn that two mites were equal to one farthing.

Geisinger, Warrentown, Mo. 1. Why do men worship with head uncovered, and women with head covered, under the new dispensation? 2. What does Paul mean in 1. Corin. 11: 4-6? Does this mean that a woman should cover her head in public worship, also in the family?

1. Because, in conformity with the apostolic prescription, the men attended public prayers in the churches bareheaded and the women veiled; that is, besides covering the head, women wore a veil in connection with the head-dress to cover also the face, modestly leaving only the space from the eye-brows to below the nose exposed. 2. It is nowhere directed that women should cover their heads in the family or at household worship. They were directed to cover or veil themselves only when out-doors.

E. C. Haynes, Rylie Texas. When, where and by whom was the first practice of taking the Lord's Supper every Sunday morning, instituted?

As we learn from sacred history, the partaking of the Lord's Supper every Sunday morning was a custom in use among the Christians of the primitive Church during the first three centuries. The date of the first observance after the death of the Saviour is uncertain. In the apostolic church the celebration regularly took place in public assemblies, in private dwellings, at common tables, in hidden places during the persecutions, at the sepulchres of martyrs, and, later, in the churches at special tables or altars.

Mrs. H. F. Kennedy, San Francisco, Cal. When and by whom was Christianity introduced into England?

It is generally believed that it was introduced into Britain before the end of the second century. Clemens Romanus (A. D 101), says, that Paul went to the "limits of the West," and Theodoret, another early writer, declares that Paul brought salvation to the isles of the ocean. There are traditions attributing its introduction to St. James, St. Simon Zelotes, and Joseph of Arimathea, the last-named, it is said, having gone to Britain about A. D. 35, and died there. Still another legend is that Lucius an English King, sent to Bishop Eleutherius at Rome for religious instructions, and on the return of his messenger, he and all his court were baptized.

THE SECOND AND THIRD SEALS.

The Concluding Events of this Dispensation as Portrayed under the Figure of the Seals.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.*

"AND when he opened the second seal I heard the Second Living One say, Go! and there went forth another,a Red horse; and to him that sat thereon it was given to take peace from the earth and that men should slay one another; and there was given to him a great sword."

It is the Day of the Lord; of searching and sanctifying chastisement to Israel; of avenging wrath to the nations. When this seal is broken that wrath is let loose on men. From the midst of the throne, there is heard the second voice of command, "Go!" and the second Rider,waiting only to obey, rides forth on his mission—the angel of war and worse than war. The horse he rides is red, flame-colored, the hue of passion,violence and blood. In the Rider's hand a "great sword;" not that used in battle; an assassin's rather than a soldier's weapon: the sword of a despot, whose frown is death. "And to him it was given to take peace from the earth, and men shall slay one another;" not alone in the open strife of nations,but in private revenge,in nihilistic frenzy; with no regard for human life when it stands in the way of lust or covetousness, or ambition,or personal animosity. That is what the earth will be, its condition of unscrupulous violence and of restless fear and suspicion, under the judgment action of this horse and his Rider.

This angel goes forth,then, from the judgment Throne to ride through the earth, from nation to nation on his mission of judicial and avenging wrath; waking up with that great sword the fierce passions of men into deeds of war, assassination, and blood: and so making this earth,by the force of men's own misdeeds, the field of their own execution, with this one exception, which will only be an aggravation of human misery, that when—on the sounding of the fifth trumpet subsequent to the opening of this seal—the abyss is opened for the issue of a demon host, the slaying of man by the hand of man is to be for five months arrested. "In those days" of agony "shall men seek death and they shall not find it; and they shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them." The power of self-destruction is then gone! (Rev. 9: 6.)

The Third Seal.

"And when he opened the third seal I heard the Third Living One say, Go; And I saw, and behold! a black horse, and he that sat on him had a balance in his hand; and I heard as it were a voice in the midst of the four Living Ones say, A measure (a chœnix) of wheat for a penny (a denarius) and three measures of barley for a penny; and the oil and the wine hurt thou not!" Again it is a voice from the "Living Ones" — the third — that commands this Rider forth on his mission.

John is startled as he gazes. "I saw it," he exclaims; and the sight filled him with new anxiety and dismay. That "black horse;" its color and form that spoke of wasting want, of slow starvation, and the "scales" in the rider's hand to weigh out the scanty food to the faint and famishing; and the price of the wheat and the barley fixed by that voice from the midst of the Living Ones (the voice of the Lord himself), while this rider is bearing down among men the sentence and the doom—all this struck home to the heart of John the words of that ancient curse, as though it were specially to affect his own kindred and people.

The judgment will be spread by this commissioned rider, wide and deep, through all the nations. The prices are judgment prices, affecting the absolute necessaries of life and will afflict with direst distress the mass of the population. The denarius was the ordinary wage for a day's work; the chœnix—a pint-and-half measure—as the ordinary allowance of wheat for a man's daily ration. In times of plenty the denarius could purchase sixteen or twenty measures, now only one.

The command of this angel to spare "the wine and the oil," that is, to lay no restrictive hand on the luxuries of life in this time of agrarian distress, of sickening want, of slow, wasting starvation, gives a significant intimation that the selfish indulgences of the wealthy [illegible] be exercised to aggravate the sense of helpless a. d unhelped wretchedness, add to exasperate into outbursts of social disturbance, as in the [illegible] sufferings, and the discontent so grievously afflicting the earth.

A PIONEER ENDEAVORER.

Mr W H Pennell the First Signer of the Christian Endeavor Constitution—A Heroic Worker and his Worthy Son.

FEW men deserve more hearty recognition at the hands of the members of the Christian Endeavor organizations, of New England at least, than Mr. William H. Pennell, whose portrait is given on this page,together with that of Mr. H. B. Pennell, his son. Mr. Pennell, the elder, is now in his fiftieth year, but is still as young and vigorous and as zealous in the cause as when he set the example to the Endeavorers of this Continent by becoming the first man to sign the constitution of the pioneer Endeavor Society.

A veteran of the war, and a man of wide culture and travel, for many years Mr. Pennell had been active in Church and Sunday School work in Portland. On Feb. 2,1881,he visited the residence of his pastor with his class of young men, and steps were then taken to organize the parent society of Christian Endeavor. When the question of a constitution was under discussion, there was some hesitation about signing the stringent prayer-meeting pledge it contained, but Mr. Pennell stepped to the front and grasping his pen, attached his signature to the document. The entire class did likewise,and the pioneer society which has been multiplied a thousand times, became an actuality. During the years since then,he has been a most energetic and popular member of the Order,and has by his personal example set a splendid pattern to the younger members. He is a trustee of the Portland Society.

MR. W. H. PENNELL,
The first Signer of the C. E. Constitution.

Mr. H. B. Pennell, his son, carries into his connection with the organization the same energy and enthusiasm that have characterized the elder Pennell's career as an Endeavorer. At eleven years of age, he was the leader of the first Christian Endeavor prayer-meeting—probably the only instance on record where a boy so young led on such an occasion, yet so fervent was his piety and so exceptional his ability even as a lad, that he did it in the simplest and most natural manner possible. He is now a successful architect in Boston.

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

MR. H. Y. RUSH, West Milton, O., writes: "Would it be in keeping with interdenominational comity and essential Gospel relations, for the Epworth League or the Christian Endeavor Society to solicit membership one from the other? Or, would it be proper that the Epworth League seek to recruit its membership from any other than the denominational membership, Sunday Schools and congregation which that Society represents? This inquiry is not made for use in any controversy, but for the satisfaction and benefit of several leading clergymen." We submit the question to our readers and would be pleased to hear from them briefly on the matter.

Ten Associations have buildings valued at $411,000, and other real estate valued at $74,700. Two Associations have endowments aggregating $70,000. Fifteen Associations have conducted eighty-four educational classes; thirteen do special work for boys; ten report 380 professed conversions.

The Y. P. S. C. E. of the Memorial Lutheran Church of Washington, D. C., held two special Thursday evening prayer meetings during March, preparatory to the regular church services held during Passion week. They were a great success and much spiritual good was accomplished. At one of the meetings the subject was "Why is Christ precious to me?" and the testimony presented by the young people brought tears to the eyes of many present.

"IN HIS NAME."

"IN His Name," be this our watch-word
As we toil along life's way;
May our hearts be pure and holy
As we work from day to day.

And may we not be wanting,
When the Master calls his own,
But be gathered with the faithful
To stand around His throne.

If "In His Name" we labor,
And trust Him on life's way,
We shall cross the shining river
And reach the golden day.

WITH OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

A strong missionary movement has been aroused in the Southport Y. M. C. A., by the visit of Dr. Harry Grattan Guinness, who conducted two services in the largest hall in the town recently, and lectured on "His Recent Experiences on the Congo," on the following day. A visit from Mr. Hudson Taylor is expected shortly. It is believed that several of the members will volunteer for work in the foreign field.

R. H. S., Louisville, Ky. There are experiences too sacred to be talked of publicly; but you can speak without referring to them. Try to say something helpful to others and you can give personal testimony of your love for Christ without being, or appearing boastful. It is due to him that you should let it be known that you are on his side. Merely reciting a passage of Scripture scarcely covers your duty either to Christ, yourself, or the Society.

At the recent celebration of the seventeenth anniversary of the Y. M. C. A., of Denver, Colo., it was announced that the Association has a total membership of 1,089. The business management is under the control of the most practical business men of the city. Two hundred and fifty-four employees of the Denver and Rio Grande railroad shops at Burnham are members. They have their own rooms well furnished and equipped, with a paid secretary in charge, educational classes, baths, library, and everything needed in a full fledged association.

Adoniram Edwards, Bangor, Me. There is nothing dishonoring to Christ in your associating in Christian work with other young people who are not of your way of thinking about baptism. You must not suppose that in differing from you as to the mode or time of baptism they are violating their conscience. If they love the Saviour and are trying to follow him and serve him, co-operate with them cordially in the work and do not let questions of rites and ceremonies separate you from your brethren and sisters in Christ.

The Jubilee of Young Men's Christian Associations to be held next year in London will be attended by friends of the Association from all lands. An effort will be made to enlist the co-operation of all in organizing a special Jubilee fund which will be used in supporting more traveling secretaries. The results of the work of those now employed have been most encouraging. They have organized new Associations, revived old ones and stimulated those already in working order.

G. S. H., Chicago. In such a country district as you describe you would be wise in organizing an Epworth League of Christian Endeavor, rather than an Epworth League. The former would unite the young people of all the churches, while the latter would be exclusively members of your own church. The Society would be stronger and would be able to do more efficient work for Christ if it included all the young people, and the members would be mutually benefited by association with each other. Pay no heed to those who have told you that organizing an Epworth League of Christian Endeavor is disloyalty to the church. You will be loyal to Christ,who prayed that his people might be one and no church can require more of you.

At Mary's Tomb.

The Traditional Scene of the Burial of the Virgin—A Spot Perpetually Lighted and held Sacred by Moslems and Christians Alike

NEXT to the Holy Sepulchre within the walls of Jerusalem, (the most sacred place in the city, or round about it) there is no spot in Palestine more highly revered by the followers of the different Oriental sects than the burial place of the Virgin which is shown in the illustration on this page. "The Tomb of the Virgin" is situated at the western corner and outside the wall of a small enclosed field near the Garden of Gethsemane, just across the brook Kedron, and at the foot of the Mount of Olives. The people of Palestine, despite their different beliefs, do not doubt the authenticity of the site, and all regard it with reverence, even the Moslems. The entrance downward to the interior of the tomb is by a flight of rude steps. Being underground, it has the aspect of a cave, and is very dark; indeed, were it not for the lights that are perpetually burning within, nothing could be distinguished by the visitor. Thousands of Greek, Latin, Koptic and Maronite pilgrims visit the tomb with the hope of thereby securing after death a speedy translation to the bliss of heaven through the intercession of the Virgin. The people of the East, unquestioningly believing in Mary's saintly intercession, seize every opportunity of visiting her burial-place and hence it is nearly always crowded with petitioning pilgrims, or Zowar, seeking salvation through this source.

Mary's tomb is called by Oriental Christians "Kabir Sittna Maryam" (the Grave of our Lady Mary.) It is in the possession of the Latin Church, which bought the ground on which it is situated. One of the Eastern gates of Jerusalem leading to it has been called "Bab Sittna Maryam" (Gate of our Lady Mary) and this official recognition of the genuineness of the site has led to its acceptance very generally by the public, although learned Orientalists are not quite agreed on this point.

Before their arrival at the tomb, western pilgrims—especially Russians—begin their harmonious melodies in the Virgin's honor; then, holding unlighted candles in their hands, they devoutly enter the chapel of the tomb, and kneel down before the grave, where they sometimes remain prostrate for hours. No sign of weariness is ever shown, although they may have come a long distance for the purpose of kneeling and repeating their prayers in this hallowed spot. Their joy at having been privileged to see where the mother of the Saviour was laid to rest is rapturous beyond description and songs of thanksgiving are lifted up in memory of the "Mother of the Lord." On concluding their visit, and while passing a tray or salver at a certain place near the chapel entrance, they give a liberal offering to assist in the preservation of the sacred place and then they emerge with songs again on their lips. Many pilgrims also leave gifts of candles to serve for the constant lighting in the chapel. Religious services are held morning and evening at the tomb, whether there are visitors or not.

Sandwich Island Children.

IN the Hawaiian Islands, the children are brought up to be moral and healthy first, and there is not a boy or girl in any family that cannot ride and swim perfectly before the age of eight years. In rich families, the little ones never wear shoes or stockings until they are three years old, or more, except on state occasions, indoors. They live in the elements, — air, wind, water, and sunshine — and the ladies are all experts in outdoor amusements. Many of the ladies ride at great speed over the superb roads of those islands. The result of this free, out-of-door life for both boys and girls is a magnificent physique in both.

A Life Lesson.

"WHEN I was a little boy," said a gentleman one day to a friend with whom he was talking, "I paid a visit to my grandfather. He was an aged man, and wore a black velvet cap, and knee breeches with large silver buckles at the knees. When I went to say good-bye to him, he took me between his knees, kissed me kindly, and then laying his hand on my head, he said: 'My dear boy, I have only one thing to say to you; will you try to remember it?' I looked him in the face and said, 'I will, grandpa.' 'Well,' said he, 'it is this: Whatever you have to do, always do the best you can.' This was my grandfather's legacy to me. It was worth more than thousands of gold and silver. I never forgot his words, and have always tried to act upon them."

Remembered Courtesies.

THERE is a French saying that courtesies and favors are like flowers, which are only sweet while they are fresh, but afterward they quickly fade and wither. "Not so," replies a noted man; "the favors you did us nearly twenty years ago are as fresh to me as if they were done yesterday. I distill them in the alembic of my memory, and they turn to essences." A beautiful reply, indeed; and how much truth there is in it! Surely all of us cherish certain kindnesses and courtesies and favors we have received from friends, and even strangers, many years ago, and they form quite a part of the pleasures of memory. How often have we heard the expression, "I shall never forget her kindness;" or, "I shall never hear that gentleman's name spoken but I recall with pleasure his courtesy to me." The fragrance of these flowers of courtesy always remains.

After Moving Day.

MOVING-DAY is gone but its memories linger, writes Dr. Talmage. Seated on the boxes in the new home you take tea, and then down with the carpets. They must be stretched, and pieced, and pulled, and matched. The whole family are on their knees at the work, and red in the face, and before the tacks are driven all the fingers have been hammered once and are taking a second bruising. Nothing is where you expect to find it. Where is the hammer? Where are the tacks? Where the hatchet? Where the screw-driver? Where the nails? Where the window-shades? Where is the slat to that old bedstead? Where are the rollers to that stand? The sweet-oil has been emptied into the blackberry-jam. The pickles and the plums have gone out together a-swimming. The lard and the butter have united as skillfully as though a grocer had mixed them. May-day is a social earthquake that annually shakes the city. It may be that very soon some of our rich relatives will, at their demise, "will" us each one a house, so that we shall be permanently fixed. We should be sorry to have them quit the world under any circumstances; but if, determined to go anyhow, they should leave us a house, the void would not be so large, especially if it were a house well furnished and having all the modern improvements. We should be thankful for any good advice they might leave us, but should most highly appreciate a house.

A MORNING PLAINT

QUIET, Lord, my froward heart,
Make me teachable and mild,
Upright, simple, free from art.
Make me as a weaned child:
From distrust and envy free,
Pleased with all that pleases Thee.

What Thou shalt to-day provide,
Let me as a child receive;
What to-morrow may betide,
Calmly to Thy wisdom leave;
'Tis enough that Thou wilt care;
Why should I the burden bear?

As a little child relies
On a care beyond its own,
Knows he's neither strong nor wise,
Fears to stir a step alone:
Let me thus with Thee abide,
As my Father, Guard and Guide.

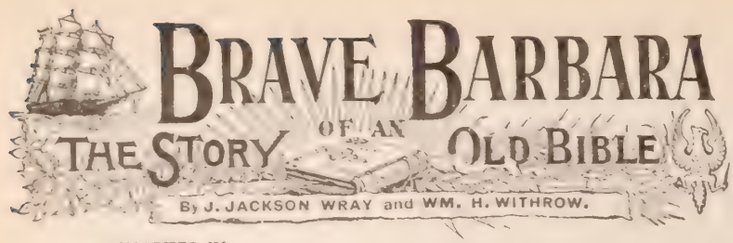
A BRAVE MOHAMMEDAN LAD.

THE Rev. Charles Wood tells a story of a Mohammedan boy in Egypt who made up his mind to be a Christian. His older brother told him that if he did change his religion he would kill him, and this was no idle threat. The brother meant to do just what he said; for if a Mohammedan changes his faith, the people think that he has forfeited his life, and one who kills him does a good deed. But Hassan —for that was the boy's name— felt that he must be a Christian, no matter how much it might cost him. Knowing that his life was in danger, he ran away to the house of a missionary, and asked that he might stay there for a little time. The missionary kept the lad. Afterward they learned that Hassan's brother had come to watch the missionary's house at night. He had a rifle, and looked at the windows, hoping that he might see his brother, or at least his shadow, and then he meant to put a bullet through the young Christian.

After awhile the family got possession of Hassan. His father locked him up, and said he would kill him the next day unless he gave up his Christian faith. The mother of the boy was a Mohammedan; but she was also a mother. Going out into the garden, she left the key in the gate, and told the boy to take a walk in the garden. He turned the key and escaped.

See how much the Mohammedan boy was willing to suffer as a Christian; but there are some reading this story whose parents would be made happier by having them say they would be Christians than by anything else they could say, and yet they will not take Christ as their Master and Saviour. Ought not the story of Hassan, who was determined to be a Christian even if it cost him his life, to shame you? Yet there are many Hassans in our own land,—boys whose ungodly surroundings are constantly drawing them away from Christ, and who have a hard battle with temptation to sin. Let such take courage from the story of Hassan.



CHAPTER IX.

AT THE CROIX BLANCHE HOSTELRY.

Our [illegible] little accustomed to the society of men who kept such state as the Governor. They became nervous, not so much on account of his manner, as because of the reverence which they saw the officers pay to him. The Governor's first question was naturally about the state of public feeling in New York. "I hope there is some loyalty there even yet," he said.

"Oh yes, your worship—I mean, your Excellency," said the nervous Paul. "All the people are not gone astray after Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who would make all Israel to sin."

This somewhat obscure reference to Scripture as an illustration of backslidings in the colonies was little better than Greek to the Governor, whose studies in the Old Testament had not been of an extensive kind. "Jeroboam! Who's he?" said the Colonel, thrusting his fingers through his grizzled hair, and fixing his grey eyes, in a mystified way, upon the speaker.

The governor had called in Colonel Featherstone, the second in command, thinking that something of import might be elicted in this interview with the new-comers.

"Do you know anything of this Jeroboam, Featherstone?" said the governor. "One of these rebels, I suppose, who has come to the front, latterly. What we want to know," continued he, turning to Paul with a reassuring smile, "is whether the New Yorkers are all gone mad after the treason-plotters who—"

"Oh, no, not so, your Excellency," said Paul, in his eagerness, "there are yet seven thousand who have not bowed their knees to Baal."

"Seven thousand? Baal? What does the man mean, Featherstone?" said the governor.

"Hanged, if I know," said that officer, a blunt old veteran, who knew a good deal more about the "Marlborough Campaigns" than the Hebrew Scriptures.

"He means," said Barbara, "that there is a considerable remnant of the people in the province of New York who are still loyal subjects of King George."

"Ha! that's more to the purpose," said the governor, with a nod and a smile. "That's a horse of another color. But how many did you say, my good man? Have they enrolled themselves in any way?"

"I said seven thousand, my lord—your Excellency, because that's the number that Elijah said were faithful to the God of Israel; but I mean a great number, you know, a great number," said Paul, gaining confidence. "I shouldn't wonder if there are even a hundred and forty and four thousand, such as—"

"That may be all very well," said the commander, sticking to his point. "But what are they going to do about it. Will they fight?"

"Many of them eschew carnal weapons, your Excellency," said Paul, who had felt the ground firm to his feet, now that he had got hold of a congenial topic. "I am not a man of war myself. My Captain is Jesus Christ; and his words are, 'Put up the sword into its sheath. My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight.' I have come here with my wife and little ones, to try to serve God, and honor the king in peace and quietness; and there's many more, your Excellency, who will follow as soon as they can get [illegible]

Then up spake honest John Lawrence. Not being himself a Palatine, he had not the same motives of gratitude for favors which filled the [illegible] persecution by the British flag; and though he [illegible] putting down rebellion and striking a blow in self-defence. "Some of us have not the same [illegible]" he, "and if the king wants more soldiers for the [illegible] raise a few regiments of loyal Americans: and I, for one—"

"That's the sort of speech, young man," said the commandant, slapping his thigh in his satisfaction. "That has the right ring about it; eh, [illegible]

The delighted Featherstone saw a recruit in honest John, and was about to ask him his name with a view to business, but the quiet and wary Barbara, seeing how things were tending, and not at all willing, either that Paul should be blamed or John entrapped, interposed.

"When the time comes, your Excellency, Paul Heck will do his duty, be it against his liking or be it otherwise. My husband is a lover of peace and a hater of strife; but when those who strive for the right are in straits, he will be there, and John Lawrence, too—but not till then."

"Right, very right," said her hearers. "We want true-hearted and loyal subjects such as you, in this quarter to colonize this magnificent province. I make you heartily welcome and as many more of your kind as you can induce to come."

He wrote a hasty note, and calling on the valet, who had been waiting within earshot, he said, "Here, Pierre, take these good people to the Croix Blanche. Give this note to Jean Baptiste Lafarge;" and bowing our immigrants politely out of the audience chamber, the Governor warmly wished them well, and promised to send for them again as soon as he had determined how he could best serve them.

"The Lord reward you for your kindness to strangers in a strange land!" said Brave Barbara; and it is not too much to say that the unfamiliar form of words, as she uttered them, touched the gallant soldier's heart more than he would have cared to own.

As the young and vigorous Irishman, John Lawrence, passed by Col. Featherstone, that wide-awake old soldier, touched him on the shoulder, and said half-aloud, and with much meaning, "You ought to be a soldier, young man. Come and join the King's Own. You'd win a sergeant's stripes within twelve months."

Honest John was not insensible to the compliment, but just then his loyalty to Christ and the "faith that was in him," came strongly to the front.

"I'm a soldier already," said he, with a ready smile, "and though I'm only a private yet, I've the best prospects of promotion, sir."

"In what regiment?" said the colonel, taken by surprise.

"The Methodists," said Barbara, answering for him. "In the army of Immanuel, Prince of Peace."

It may well be believed that those simple words of my noble peasant heroine were the first proclamation of Methodist loyalty to Immanuel made in Canada, the land in which so much and so many of Wesley's triumphs have been won.

Brave Barbara and her two comrades were conducted by the valet to a narrow back street close by the high stone wall that guarded the rear of the town. The Governor had well judged that inexpensive accommodation was a matter of importance to the wanderers he was so willing to befriend. Part of this old wall still remains, but the historic old "Croix Blanche" where Brave Barbara found home and shelter has passed away.

The inn was a queer, rambling old building of one story, with thick stone walls, with immense gambles and stacks of chimneys. The roof was very steep, and from it rose two rows of small dormer windows. It was almost as high as the walls, and gave the quaint old house the appearance of a rather small man with an uncommonly large hat; and like all the buildings which marked the curious old French Canadian cities of those days was both odd and comfortable to look at and to live in.

Mine host of the "Croix Blanche," Jean Baptiste Lafarge by name, was a rubicund old fellow, whose rotundity of girth somewhat belied the aspect of his face. Being not only an innkeeper, but also one of the town bakers, Jean Baptiste wore the big white apron and the round white cap peculiar to his calling. He evidently did not take kindly to the new-comers; and intimated to them first in French, and then in very broken English that he would rather have their room than their company.

Barbara gathered from his somewhat voluble speech that he had no room; and then that he had "not plenty suffeecient mattress," and finally that the "Croix Blanche" was especially "une auberge Canadienne," [a Canadian inn.] At this point, however, the courteous Pierre was able to get a word or two edge-wise, and bade the irate Jean read the Governor's letter.

This produced an instant and remarkable change in the manner of the worthy innkeeper.

"Ah!" said the worthy baker, in a tone of geniality, "if it will be a sairvice to Monsieur le Governeur, I will have ze plaisir to entertain messieurs and ze madames," and here our host bowed low, especially to Barbara, washing his hands the while with invisible soap in imperceptible water. "Marie!" he called to his wife—a black-eyed, pleasant-looking dame in a bright red kirtle and a snow-white Norman cap, and asked her to show their guests to such apartments as they had at their disposal. With a bright smile on her face, the French-woman led them up the narrow, crooked stairs to a range of queer, quaint rooms, half chamber, half attic, which were sufficiently spacious, and which had the further advantage of being "sheap, vare sheap," as Marie affirmed in such broken English as she could command."

Thoroughly satisfied with her new quarters, and more than content with the prospect of a clean and restful bed, after her long half-gipsy, half-sailor life on board the lumbering barge, Barbara declared herself "at home," and won the heart of the kindly little French-woman by her ready witness that the apartments were "so clean and comfortable; reminding her of her own dear home in the farm-house at Ballygarane, on the other side of the sea."

Paul and John Lawrence hastened off to the quay to fetch Mary Embury, and the little folks, to the quaint old hostelry which was to provide them all with a temporary home. When this was done they set about removing their little store of goods and chattels from the batteaux to a large out-building that flanked Jean Baptiste's bakehouse, and our two pioneer families were happily housed under the hospitable shelter of the "Croix Blanche."

"If only Pastor Philip had been here," said Barbara, as she sat at the table with the old German Bible lying open before her, "surely our comfort will be complete. And yet," she continued, laying her hand on the arm of the young widow who was seated by her side, "his comfort has no drawbacks. They say that the name of this city is really Mount Royal, and a royal resting-place and beautiful it is, to this day, but our well-beloved comrade Philip has his high dwelling in the real Mount Royal, where he sees the King in his beauty, in the land which is, to him, no longer afar off. We are pilgrims yet. Paul, my dear," she continued, handing over to her worthy husband the thin homely "Book of Hymns," roughly bound in mottled calf-skin, which, next to her German Bible, was the most sacred of volumes in her eyes, "Let us read the Pilgrim's Song. Line it out, so that the children may all hear it, and understand from it that to us Montreal is only a station on the way to the real Mount Royal, where Jesus and Philip are."

No sooner said than done, and in a few moments the grand and stirring old hymn which has raised the spirits of thousands of tired pilgrims like the sound of a trumpet, woke the echoes of the "Croix Blanche" with:

Come on, my partners in distress,
My comrades through this wilderness,
Who still your bodies feel,
Awhile forget your griefs and fears
And look behind this vale of tears,
To that celestial hill

Then kneeling around the wainscotted old chamber, the group were led in prayer by the staid and earnest Paul, and then at her husband's request, by Brave Barbara, who had a listener behind the wainscot of whose presence she was unaware. This was none other than the kindly-spirited, pleasant-faced hostess of the "Croix Blanche," Marie Lefarge! Her curiosity had been awakened in the first instance by the Governor's recommendation, and by Barbara's words of praise. It was a good deal sharpened by the thrilling sounds of the pilgrims' song; and Marie could not forbear taking advantage of a convenient and inviting crack in the boarded partition.

By the alternate application of eye and ear, she was able to understand a little of the sacred exercises in which our immigrants were engaged. When she saw the hands of Barbara uplifted, and her face upturned the while she talked with God, and heard her pray for Jean Baptiste, and for "the dear, kind Marie, whose voice is so gentle and her smile so sweet," the good soul turned her eye to the crack to look on her again, and could not, for her tears were falling, but she did whisper to herself, "Amen" as she softly turned away.

In this instance, as in many another, Brave Barbara, like many another co-worker with God, was sowing better than she knew—was well and wisely placing the good seed of the kingdom, all unconscious of the harvest of fruit and service which was to be reaped for our Lord and Master—under the sign and shadow of the Croix Blanche!

As Brave Barbara and her friend Mary Embury were standing, subsequently, at the quaint window of their dormitory, talking over the haven of peace to which they had come, and the wonderful way in which the Lord had led them, the elder woman, fancying she saw some traces of anxiety on the widow's face, set herself to the sweet task of administering good cheer to them that were cast down.

"All is well, sister Mary," she said. "Ours has been a wandering life, and full often the way has in it something of the wilderness, but much of sunshine and many a patch of green pastures and still waters. To you," she said, turning her expressive eyes upon her companion, who still carried the weeds of widowhood, which only set off the superior beauty of her face, "has fallen the shadow of death—ay, and to me, too," she continued, as she thought of the curly-haired little lassie over whose grave at Salem she had let fall the tears of bereavement; "but we know that they we mourned for are through the 'shadow' and out of the 'valley.'"

"True," said Mary, with half a sigh and with half a smile; "it doth not become me to grieve: does it? And yet," she said, with a longer sigh, that would rise in spite of her, "I am but a lone widow in a strange land, and my children have no father's willing hand and loving heart to protect, maintain, and guide them at times, though I try to hide it for my friends' sakes—yet it will up and out in spite of me."

"Nay, nay," quoth Brave Barbara, "I cannot permit you to have such thoughts. No father? and yet I see the children kneeling in your company, morn by morn, saying in your ear, 'Our Father which art in heaven,' and taught to say it by our dear Philip and yourself in the happy yesterdays. Philip has gone, but 'Our Father' stays, stays all the time, and will never leave nor forsake you or yours."

The conversation between the two friends was interrupted at this point by the entrance of their hostess, Marie Lefarge. She came to invite her guests to look over the old house and to see the wonderful view from the window of her own little chamber. Barbara Heck and Mary Embury were pleased by this sign of friendliness and willingly accompanied her. The view from the window was one to impress a lover of the picturesque, and they stood long gazing on the green meadows and the fair slopes of Mount Royal with its forest-crowned crest. Turning from the room, Mary noticed a little shrine built into the wall, containg a small image of the Madonna, before which stood two candles, not now alight, and two nosegays of sweet flowers. Mary, with native delicacy, and the true Christian spirit which respects its neighbor's conscience, quietly drew back, and the three passed on, but the hostess noted with surprise that neither of her visitors, who, she thought, were very good and pious, made any gesture of adoration to the image. She did not refer to the omission then, but when, a little later, the tour of the house being finished, she was making her little speech of courtesy, she said that she hoped they would be happy in the "Croix Blanche," and added rather pointedly, "I will pray ze blessed Mere de Dieu to have care of you."

The Great Value of Fresh Air.

Every one knows the physical benefit that comes from a day in the open air, but few stop to reflect on the reason. This may be found in the fact that the air so breathed has contained more oxygen, and therefore helped the blood, with which it has come in contact in the lungs, to throw off an unusual amount of the body's waste and impurities in the form of carbonic acid gas.

This is exactly what occurs, only with greater effect, when Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen is introduced into the system. The agent is common air, enriched with more oxygen and combined with a magnetic vital element which the whole system heartily welcomes and absorbs. By it the lungs are expanded, the blood purified and the nerve centres re-vitalized. This is in short the building up, by the natural method, of those foundations of life and health, the injury of which is indicated by what we call disease.

Another unique feature is that by means of the Home Treatment, the better and richer air which Compound Oxygen supplies, can be made available for the sick person in his own room, without exposure, effort or fatigue.

While the theory of Compound Oxygen is very interesting, its wonderful history is still more so. For more than 23 years and in over 60,000 carefully recorded cases, it has shown its marvelous power to heal and restore most desperate chronic diseases, such as Consumption, Catarrh, Asthma, Dyspepsia, Rheumatism and Nervous Prostration. Every question which this statement can raise can be cheerfully answered by Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, No. 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

A Soldier for Christ.

Lieutenant Lavery, once Drunkard and Dive-Keeper, now a Brave Worker for Jesus—The "People's Tabernacle" in Spokane.

ONE of the best-known Christian workers in the West is Lieutenant Thomas Lavery, Superintendent of the People's Tabernacle, Spokane, Wash., whose portrait is given on this page.

Mr. Lavery is a native of Vermont and is fifty-one years of age. While still a very young man, he acquired a taste for liquors, and squandered his earnings in bar-rooms. In 1861, after a somewhat wild career, he entered the army and his bravery and ability secured him speedy promotion. At the battle of Shiloh, he was severely wounded. After the war, he engaged in the saloon business and gradually fell lower and lower in the social scale, until he became the keeper of a "dive" in Chicago and a hard drinker. In 1881 he was converted while listening to an address by Ben Hogan, the reformed pugilist and drunkard. Since that time, the path of Lieutenant Lavery has been upward and onward in the spiritual life.

LIEUTENANT THOMAS LAVERY, EVANGELIST.

In 1884, Mr. Lavery and his wife, now fairly embarked in evangelistic work, assumed charge of the Day Nursery at 368 South Clark Street, Chicago, under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, Mr. Lavery looking after the destitute people in that section of the city, distributing clothing and speaking to the drinking men words of advice and counsel, and opening to them the Word of God. In 1885-6 he had charge of the Bethel Home Mission, in which position he accomplished much good. From the results of his labor in Illinois, Iowa, Indiana and other States, his friends predicted for him increasing success in his Master's vineyard.

Sometime ago he went to Spokane, Wash., and held a series of Gospel meetings in the First Methodist Church which were greatly blessed. He was chosen as Superintendent of the People's Tabernacle, Spokane, and under his energetic management and vigorous spirituality a great work was inaugurated. The founder of the People's Tabernacle is Mr. W. J. Dunstan of Spokane, a gentleman of large liberality and one of the leading promoters of every good work in that city. The Tabernacle is a church, employment agency and lodging-house combined, the object being to help the deserving poor. None is sent away hungry or cold. The upper floors are fitted as dormitories, library and dispensary. In the first quarter of the present year, the following was the record: baths given, 70; garments distributed, 307; lodgers from Jan. 25, 265; employment provided for 105 people; secured transportation for four persons; legal advice free to nine persons; medical assistance to 47; visits paid to the poor, 33; funerals officiated at, 3; average daily attendance at the gospel meetings, 75; number of conversions reported, 74. Mr. David Clopton, of Spokane, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

Lieutenant Lavery is, beyond doubt, one of the greatest workers for the cause of Christ that I ever knew. He organized three months ago an institution to which men and women who have met with adversity can come and find shelter, food and raiment free of all cost and in the same building he has been conducting a series of revival meetings every evening during the week and twice on Sunday for three months past, so that not only have these poor unfortunate people the things pertaining to this life but to the life everlasting. He has awakened an interest among all classes of people here and his meetings are very largely attended. Souls are being brought to Christ, and ministers of different denominations have sanctioned his good work. This institution is non-denomination al in its character, for each church is represented by a Board of Trustees.

THE RING FOUND.

PEOPLE who are discouraged by seeing no results from Christian work which Providence seemed to closely indicate as a duty, may find consolation in a Persian legend which appears in a foreign journal. It suggests the thought that although we may see no benefit, nor prospect of any, God may have some design which we are unconsciously advancing. The story runs that a certain king needed a faithful servant and two men were candidates for the office. He took both at fixed wages and his first order to them was to fill a basket with water from a neighboring well, saying that he would come in the evening and see their work. After putting in one or two bucketfuls, one of the men said, "What is the good of doing this useless work? As soon as we put the water in one side it runs out on the other." The other man answered, "But we have our day's wages, haven't we? The use of the work is the master's business, not ours." "I am not going to do such fool's work," replied the other; and throwing down his bucket he went away. The other man continued until he had exhausted the well. Looking down into it he saw something shining, and he managed to get up a diamond ring. "Now I see the use of pouring water into a basket," he exclaimed. "If the bucket had brought up the ring before the well was dry, it would have been found in the basket. Our work was not useless." Christians, when called upon to do or suffer something which seems very unreasonable and useless, must believe that their Divine Master knows what is best, and that in due time they themselves will know and understand.

Sciatic Rheumatism

Mr. R. D. Wheeler, the popular deputy sheriff of Burlington County, Vt., says: "I suffered terrible tortures for 10 years with sciatic rheumatism. I tried about everything, but never got a dollar's worth of help I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. Since taking it I don't have any pain and can get around all right. If Hood's Sarsaparilla cost $10 a bottle I should continue using it. I have advised a good many of my friends to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, for I know that

POETS AND ROYALTY.*

JOHN LYLY was born in Kent in 1553 or 1554, and studied at both Universities. He attached himself to the Court of Elizabeth, and it was said that he "was heard, graced and rewarded" by the Queen. The reward, whatever it was, came tardily, for after much seeking of the post of "Master of the Revels," he had at last to "ask for some little grant to support him in his old age." . . .

Sir Thomas Wyatt attracted great attention, partly by his handsome person and partly by his wit. One day the King (Henry VIII.), feigned some conscientious scruples as to his separation from Queen Catherine, whereupon Wyatt exclaimed: "That a man cannot repent of his sin without the Pope's leave!" . . . Lands and honors were conferred upon Wyatt, who, in his later years, was constantly seeking to exchange the vitiated atmosphere of the Court for the quiet and repose of his own country home . .

Queen Elizabeth, in recognition of Edmund Spenser's services to the Crown, bestowed upon him 3,000 acres in the county of Cork. Residence was imposed upon him and it was here he wrote a considerable portion of his Faerie Queene. He was regarded with fierce jealousy in Ireland, and ultimately the murmurings of the people gave place to action and he had to leave his home with such precipitancy that it was said one of his children was lost in the firing of the old castle at Kilcolman. Broken in health and spirit when he reached London, he died there in 1599 . . . .

Sir Walter Raleigh's soldier-like qualities brought him into the favor of Queen Elizabeth, who knighted him and made him a grant of lands. He engaged in various expeditions to the Americas and from his maiden sovereign Virginia received its name. Suspicion attached to him, and at the hands of the Queen he suffered various indignities; but it remained for her successor, James, to avail himself of a court conspiracy to extinguish him. . . .

John Donne interested himself in the controversy between the English Reformed Church and the Church of Rome, while his loyal views brought him into the favor of King James. The king urged him to enter the Church and, after three years' delay, he consented. A year or two later, the king invited Donne to dinner, sat down himself and proceeded to address him thus: "Mr. Donne, I have invited you to dinner; and although you sit not down with me, I will carve you of a dish I know you love well; for knowing you love London, I do, therefore, make you Dean of St. Paul's, and when you have dined, then take your beloved dish home to your study, say grace there to yourself and much good may it do you."

At the Eleventh Hour.

IT was a long, weary night of watching that the young girl spent by the bedside of her dying father. None but those who have sat the hours through know how seemingly endless they are from midnight to dawn, and Marie Fabre had no experience, and was very nervous besides. But the physician who attended the sick man had said that he must have constant attention; so Marie sat up, for she would not trust a hired nurse. Besides, her father might become fully conscious and want to speak to her.

Marie loved her father, though she feared him, too. She had come with him and her mother when they fled across the Atlantic after those terrible days of the Commune in Paris, when Jules Fabre had been in the front ranks, and had done his share in the bloody deeds which made all Europe shudder with horror. In America he had prospered, but his associations were with wild, desperate men, whose talk made Marie's cheek pale and her heart sink with dread at the thought of the reign of anarchy for which they were so eager. Her mother had been dead for some years, and now her father lay dying. For herself, Marie had no fear. She, by her mother's management, had secured Christian friends who would have made a home for her away from her father and his infidel associates, if she would have consented to leave him. By them she had been led to the Saviour.

Through the long night she sat wakeful and alert, but there was no change in the dying man. He took his medicine mechanically when she gave it to him, but he did not recognize her, nor appear to know where he was. "Oh," said Marie earnestly, "if he would only awake, that I might offer but one prayer with him before he dies. Perhaps he would let me pray with him now." She could not be sure of it; for early in his illness, when she suggested it, he had sternly bade her do no such thing, and had spoken more harshly than he ever spoke to her before. Since then Marie had prayed much for him, and she hoped her prayers would be heard.

As the day broke he slowly opened his eyes and looked at her intelligently. Marie saw that the light of reason had returned, and was instantly at his bedside. His voice was very feeble, and the huskiness of death was in his throat.

"Father, dear father," said Marie, "will you not let me pray for you?"

"I am dying, I suppose," said the sufferer; "they generally fetch a priest at the last, but I do not want one; they can do me no good. I will die as I have lived."

"I will pray, father, if you will let me; we need not send for a priest."

"Well, little one, as you like; it can do me no good; I have led a bad life, and I must take the consequences."

"You need not, father; God will forgive you if you will only ask him to do it, for his dear Son's sake, who died for you."

"You are a good girl, little one; do you pray. Perhaps God will hear you; he would not listen to me."

"He will, indeed, father, if you really want him to."

"But I do not know what to say."

"Say just this, 'God be merciful to me a sinner, for Christ's sake.'"

"That is the right prayer for me, surely. I can say that." And the dying man said it with evident sincerity. Then Marie prayed earnestly for him, holding his hand as she knelt. Suddenly she felt the grasp relax, and heard a long-drawn sigh. Looking up quickly, she saw the unmistakable change, and realized that her father was gone. Had his prayer been heard in that last sad hour? Marie hoped so, and the thought comforted her. Like the thief on the cross, he had appealed to infinite love and mercy, and none could say that it would be refused to him.

it is to see an infant suffering from the lack of proper food. It is entirely unnecessary, as a reliable food can always be obtained; we refer to the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. Sold by grocers and druggists everywhere.

The universal praise given Hood's Sarsaparilla by those who have taken it, should certainly convince you that it is the best spring medicine. It thoroughly purifies the blood.

Our Canal.

It will take a year or two to get water where we begin to sell; then ready for settlers.

Dry land is of little account in Southern California, it stretches away for miles, as rich and right as land can be.

But water is precious; no rain to speak of falls. Irrigation is better than rain; the farmer gets it when and where he wants it. Vegetation exceeds belief—a three-year-old fig-tree five inches through! The warmth of the air and soil develops exceeding richness in fruits and nuts.

A little land with water is wealth. We shall have the water; the land is waiting. We want a share of our stock in every neighborhood; $50 a share will be worth $1,000 within ten years if we make no mistakes. Let us send you a pamphlet with map.

KING HEZEKIAH'S POOL.

A Historic Part of Jerusalem which Few Pilgrims Fail to Visit—Memories of Israel's "Great and Good King."

HISTORY, ancient or modern, holds no nobler figure than that of the good King Hezekiah, who ascended the throne of his fathers in Jerusalem and of whom it is recorded that "he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord." A young man of twenty-five, he brought to the duties of government a firm hand and steady purpose, an upright heart and a pure conscience that revolted against the idolatries and wickedness of his father, Ahaz. He immediately took steps to abolish idolatry and restore the worship of Jehovah. Such was his zeal for religion that he would not tolerate even a remnant of the sinful practices of his predecessor, and he destroyed the altars and places of idol worship in Ephraim and Manasseh and other places. Equally great in peace and in war, the good king cultivated agriculture and the industrial arts and at the same time showed himself an efficient military leader in various campaigns. It was while fortifying and preparing Jerusalem against a threatened attack by the armies of Sennacherib, that Hezekiah, by skilful engineering, diverted the water-courses and conducted the stream of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal. When the Assyrian general, treacherously violating his compact, a second time laid siege to the Jewish capital, Hezekiah laid the matter before the Lord, and help came in the most marvelous and unexpected manner—185,000 soldiers in the overcrowded camp of the besiegers dying in a single night!

Hezekiah's pool (shown in the illustration on this page), although constructed 2,500 years ago, is still in a fair state of preservation. When the King wanted his engineers to stop the upper watercourse of Gihon (II. Kings 20:20; II. Chron. 32:30), he "digged the hard rock with iron and made wells." This pool, called by the natives of Jerusalem Birket-il-Hammam ("bath pool"), is in the northern part of the modern city, not far east from Bab-el-Khaleel, or the Jaffa gate. There is no doubt that it is the true location since the waters of the upper pool of Gihon, Birket Mamilla, flow through small, roughly-built aqueducts in the vicinity of the Jaffa gate, and thus reach the Hezekiah pool, whose waters flow into the Turkish bath nearby. The pool is 144 feet broad and 240 feet long, but not very deep; and the rocky bottom is covered with cement. In winter it is well filled with water, and is very serviceable to that part of the town, especially as the neighboring houses are dependent on its water during nearly the whole year. In the hot season, the cisterns are empty and water is sometimes very scarce, and the water of the pool is welcome, though then in its worst condition, having lain stagnant, perhaps, for months since the rains. The pool is capable of containing about 300,000 gallons, but it is in bad repair. As to cleaning it out, nothing so revolutionary ever entered the brain of a Jerusalemite. The bottom is deep with the black mud of decayed leaves and vegetation. Were the Hezekiah pool in good condition and containing 600,000 gallons of water—its full capacity—it would doubtless be sufficient for the whole population of Jerusalem.

But as long as the Turkish officials only think of their own comfort, no repairs can be made. Fortunately, the cisterns of the monasteries, however, are very wide and deep, holding a large quantity of water, of which a good portion is given away, not only to the Christians, but also to many Moslems during the dry season.

King Hezekiah's pool has on its north-west margin a Coptic monastery; on the east, a line of private houses, one of which was in 1868 the chapel of an evangelical congregation. Farther east is a Mohammedan mosque, with a minaret and a military school for young Moslems. A little beyond this is the celebrated Church of the Holy Sepulchre. These places are on Christian Street (Haret-el-Nasherel), so-called, because it is a quarter occupied only by Christians. On the left side of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, is another Moslem mosque. All these are shown in our illustration.

Besides the regular supply from Hezekiah's Pool, in case of scarcity of water in Jerusalem in summer, there is a considerable quantity of water brought to the city from the neighboring spring of Siloam in the lower part of the city upon the East side, and adjacent to the brook Kedron, and also from the spring or cistern known as "Job's Well," at a distance of about two miles from the Siloam fountain. The spring of Siloam is at the foot of Mount Zion, on which part of Jerusalem is situated. It has the shape of a cavern with a few rude steps leading to the underground rivulet or spring which constantly trickles down, scantily in summer, yet quite sufficient for the village of Siloam, and enough to furnish a small surplus for sale to the natives of Jerusalem. There are many men in Siloam whose work in summer consists solely of transporting water from this spring, on donkeys, to sell in the city. They sell a sheep-skin of water for a piastre (five cents), and upward. If a Siloam man is so fortunate as to own two donkeys, he can then go from five to ten times a day to the city with six leathern sacks full every time, which bring him at the close of the day a revenue of about seventy piastres.

The water supply from "Job's Well" is disposed of in the same way as that from the Siloam fountain; but it is dearer, because the supply is purer. It is drawn with iron or wooden buckets, bound to [illegible] from which the water has to be taken. In years of little rainfall, when Siloam spring and "Job's Well" cannot satisfy the necessities of the people of Jerusalem, the natives of Ain Karem and Malha, two neighboring villages, convey water to the city and dispose of it at exorbitant prices. The water of Ain Karem is the sweetest and purest in Palestine, and is highly esteemed by poor and rich alike.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

HARP AND JAVELIN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, 1 Sam. 18: 10, 11: "And David played with his hand, as at other times: and there was a javelin in Saul's hand. And Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it. And David avoided out of his presence twice."

WHAT a spectacle for all ages! Saul, a giant, and David, a dwarf. An unfortunate war ballad had been composed and sung eulogising David above Saul. That song threw Saul into a paroxysm of rage, which brought on one of his old spells of insanity, to which he had been subject. If one is disposed to some physical ailment, and he get real mad, it is very apt to bring on one of his old attacks. Saul is a raving maniac and he goes to imitating the false prophets or sibyls, who kicked and gesticulated wildly when they pretended to be foretelling events. Whatever the physicians of the royal staff may have prescribed for the disordered king, I know not, but David prescribed music. Having keyed up the harp, his fingers began to pull the rhythm from the vibrated strings. Thrum! Thrum! Thrum! No use. The king will not listen to the exquisite cadences. He lets fly a javelin, expecting to pin the minstrel to the wall, but David dodged the weapon and kept, on for he was confident that he could, as before, subdue Saul's bad spirit by music. Again the javelin is flung and David dodges it and departs. What a contrast! Roseate David with a harp and enraged Saul with a javelin. Who would not rather play the one than fling the other? But that was not the only time in the world's history that harp and javelin met. Where their birth-place was, I cannot declare. It is said that the lyre was first suggested by the tight drawing of the sinews of a tortoise across its shell, and that the flute was first suggested by the blowing of the wind across a bed of reeds, and that the ratio of musical intervals was first suggested to Pythagoras by the different hammers on the anvil of the smithy, but the harp seems to me to have dropped out of the sky and the javelin to have been thrown up from the pit. The oldest stringed instrument of the world is the harp. Jubal sounded his harp in the book of Genesis. David played many of his psalms on the harp while he sang them. The captives in Babylon hung their harps on the willows. Josephus celebrated the invention of the ten-stringed harp. Timotheus, the Milesian, was imprisoned for adding the twelfth string to the harp, because too much luxury of sound might enervate the people. Egyptian harps, Scottish harps, Welsh harps, Irish harps, have been celebrated. What an inspired triangle! Everlasting honors to Sebastian Erard, who, by pedals invented, called the foot as well as the hand to the harp. When the harpsicord maker for whom he worked discharged him for his genius, the employer not wanting to be eclipsed by his subordinate, Erard suffered from the same passion of jealousy that threw Saul of my text into the fit during which he flung a javelin at the harpist. The harp is almost human, as you find when you put your finger on its pulse. Other instruments have louder voice, and may be better for a battle charge, but what exquisite sweetness slumbers between the harp strings, waking at the first touch of the tips of the fingers. It can weep. It can plead. It can soothe. It can pray. The flute is more mellow, the trumpet is more startling, the organ is more majestic, the cymbals are more festive, the drum is more resounding, but the harp has a richness of its own, and will continue its mission through all time and then take part in celestial symphonies, for St. John says he heard in heaven the harps of God.

But the javelin of my text is just as old. It is about five feet and a half long, with wooden handle and steel point, keen and sharp. But it belongs to the great family of death-dealers, and is brother to sword and spear and bayonet, and first cousin to all the implements that wound and slay. It has cut its way through the ages. It was old when Saul, in the scene of my text, tried to harpoon David. It has gashed the earth with grave trenches. Its keen tip is reddened with the blood of American wars, English wars, German wars, Russian wars, French wars, Crusader wars, and wars of all nations and of all ages. The structure of the javelin shows what it was made for. The plowshare is sharp, but aimed to cut the earth in preparation for harvests. The lightning rod is sharp, but aimed to disarm the lightnings and secure safety. The axe is sharp, but aimed to fell forests and clear the way for human habitation. The knife is sharp, but aimed to cut the bread for sustenance. But the javelin is sharp only to open human arteries and extinguish human eyesight and take human life and fill the earth with the cries of orphanage and widowhood and childlessness. Oh, I am so glad that my text brings them so close together that we can see the contrast between the harp and the javelin. The one to soothe, the other to hurt; the one to save, the other to destroy; the one divine, the other diabolic; the one to play, the other to hurl; the one in David's skilful hand, the other in Saul's wrathful clutch. May God speed the harp, may God grind into dulness the sharp edge of the javelin!

Now what does all this make you think of? It suggests to me music as a medicine for physical and mental disorders. David took hold of the musical instrument which he best knew how to play and evoked from it sounds which were for King Saul's diversion and medicament. But, you say, the treatment in this case was a failure. Why was it a failure? Saul refused to take the medicine. A whole apothecary shop of curative drugs will do nothing toward healing your illnesses if you refuse to take the medicine. It was not the fault of David's prescription, but the fault of Saul's obstinacy. David, one of the wisest and best of all ages, stands before us in the text administering music for nervous disorder and cerebral disturbance. And David was right. Music is the mightiest force in all therapeutics. Its results may not be seen as suddenly as other forms of cure, but it is just as wonderful. You will never know how much suffering and sorrow music has assuaged and healed. A soldier in the United States army said that on the days the regimental band played near the hospitals all the sick and wounded revived, and men who were so lame they could not walk before, got up and went out and sat in the sunshine, and those so dispirited that they never expected to get home began to pack their baggage and ask about time-tables on steamboat and rail train. Theodosius, the Emperor, wrathful at the behavior of the people of Antioch, who, on some sudden provocation, tore down the statues of Emperor and Empress, resolved severely to punish them, but the Bishop, knowing that the Emperor had a group of boys sing to him while eating at the table, taught the boys a plaintive song in which the people lamented their bad behavior, and the king, under the pathos of the music, cried out: "The city of Antioch is forgiven." The rage of Achilles was assuaged by a harp. Asclepiades swayed rebellious multitudes by a harp. After the battle of Yorktown, when a musician was to suffer amputation, and before the days of anesthetics, the wounded artist called for a musical instrument and lost not a note during the forty minutes of amputation. Filippo Palma, the great musician, confronted by an angry creditor, played so enchantingly before him that the creditor forgave the debt and gave the debtor ten guineas more to appease other creditors. An eminent physician of olden time contended (of course, carrying our theory too far) that all ailments of the world could be cured by music. The medical journals never report their recoveries by this mode. But in what twilight hour has many a saint of God solaced a heartache with a hymn hummed or sung or played! Jerome of Prague sang while burning at the stake. Over what keys of piano or organ consolation has walked. Yea, in church one hymn has rolled peace over a thousand of the worried, perplexed and agonized. While there are hymns and tunes ready for the jubilant, there is a rich hymnology for the suffering—"Naomi" and "Eventide" and "Autumn Leaves" and "Come, ye disconsolate," and whole portfolios and librettos of tears set to music. All the wonderful triumphs of surgery and all the new modes of successful treatment of physical and mental disorders are discussed in medical conventions and spread abroad in medical books, and it is high time that some of the millions of souls that have been medicated by music, vocal and instrumental, let the world know what power there is in sweet sound, whether rolling from lip or leaping from tightened chord or ascending from ivory key. Music is a universal language. At the foot of the Tower of Babel language was split into fragments never to be again put together, but one thing was not hurt, and that is music, and it is the same all the world over. Last summer in Russia at a watering-place we were greeted as we entered a great auditorium, which was filled with thousands of Russians, whose language I could not understand any more than they could understand mine. But after the grand band had, out of compliment to us, played our two great American airs, I stepped on the platform and said to the bandmaster, "Russian air! Russian air!" and then he tapped with his baton on the music rack, and with a splendor and majesty of power that almost made us quail, the full band poured forth their National Anthem. They understood our American music, and we understood their Russian music. It is a universal language and so good for universal cure. I should not wonder if in the day of Judgment it should be found out that more souls have been saved by music than by preaching. I should not wonder if, out of the one hundred and forty and four thousand ransomed souls that John foresaw before the throne of God, at least one hundred and thirty thousand had been saved by sweet song. Why does not the church on earth take the hint? Heaven is the great musical centre of the universe, the place of doxologies and trumpets and harps, and in preparation for that place, we ought to make more of music on earth. The band of music at Waterloo played the retreat of the Forty-Second Highlanders back to their places, and sacred music has returned many a faltering host of God into the Christian conflict with as much determination and dash as Tennyson's "Six Hundred." Who can tell what has been accomplished by Charles Wesley's seven thousand hymns, or by the congregational singing of his time, which could be heard two miles off? When my dear friend, Dio Lewis (gone to rest all too soon), conducted a campaign against drunkenness at the West, and marshalled thousands of the noblest women of the land in that magnificent campaign, and whole neighborhoods and villages and cities shut up their grog-shops, do you know the chief weapon used? It was the song:

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee.

They sang it at the door of hundreds of liquor saloons which had been open for years, and either at the first charge of the campaign or the second the saloon shut up. At the first verse of "Nearer, my God, to thee," the liquor dealers laughed; at the second verse, they looked solemn; at the third verse, they began to cry; and at the fourth verse, they got down on their knees. You say they opened their saloons again. Yes, some of them did. But it is a great thing to have hell shut up if only for a week. Give full swing to a good gospel hymn and it would take the whole world for God!

But when in my text I see Saul declining this medicine of rhythm and cadence and actually hurling a javelin at the heart of David, the harpist, I bethink myself of the fact that sin would like to kill sacred music. We are not told what tune David was playing on the harp that day, but from the character of the man we know it was not a crazy madrigal, or a senseless ditty, or a sweep of strings suggestive of the melodrama, but elevated music, God-given music, inspired music, religious music, a whole heaven of it encamped under a harp string. No wonder that wicked Saul hated it and could not abide the sound, and with all his might hurled an instrument of death at it. I know there are styles of music that sin admires, and you hear it as you pass the casino or the dance hall, and the devil has stolen most of the fiddles, though I am glad the Ole Bulls have snatched up the charmed strings from their desecration; but it is a fact that sin has a javelin for sacred sounds. In many churches the javelin of criticism has killed the music, javelin flung from organ loft or from adjoining pew of the supersensitive. Saul's javelin aimed at David's harp. Thousands of people so afraid they may not sing scientifically, they will not sing at all, or sing with such low tone that no one hears them. In many a church the javelin of criticism has crippled the harp of worship. If Satan could silence all the Sunday School songs and the hymns of Christian worship, he would gain his greatest achievement. When the millennial song shall rise (and it is being made ready) there will be such a roll of voices, such a concentred power of stringed and wind instruments, such majesty, such unanimity, such continental and hemispheric and planetary acclamation, that it will be impossible to know where earth stops and heaven begins. Roll on, roll in, roll up, thou millennial harmony!

See also in my subject a rejected opportunity of revenge. Why did not David pick up Saul's javelin and hurl it back again? David had a skilful arm. He demonstrated on another occasion he could wield a sling, and he could have easily picked up that javelin, aimed it at Saul, the would-be assassin, and left the foaming and demented monster as lifeless under the javelin as he had left Goliath under a sling. Oh, David, now is your chance. No, no. Men and women with power of tongue or pen or hand to reply to an embittered antagonist, better imitate David, and let the javelin lie at your feet and keep the harp in your hand. Do not strike back. Do not play the game of tit-for-tat. Gibbon, in his history, tells of Bajazet, the great Moslem general, who was brought a captive to the tent of Timur. He had attempted the massacre of Timur and his men. Timur said to him: "Had you vanquished us, I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops, but I disdain to retaliate. Your life and honor are secure, and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man." Beautiful! Revenge on Christian's tongue or pen or hand is inapt, and more damage to the one who employs it, than the one against whom it is employed. What! A javelin hurled at you and fallen at your feet, and you not hurl it back again? Yes. I have tried the plan. I learned it from my father and have practiced it all my life, and it works well, and by the help of God and javelins not picked up, I have conquered all my foes, and preached funeral sermons in honor of most of them. The best thing you can do with a javelin hurled at you is to let it lie where it dropped, or hang it up in your museum as a curiosity. The deepest wound made by a javelin is not by the sharp edge, but at the dull end of the handle to him who wields it. I leave it to you to say which got the best of that fight in the palace—Saul or David.

See also in my subject that the fact that a man sometimes dodges is not against his courage. My text says that when Saul assailed him, "David avoided out of his presence twice," that is, when the javelin was flung, he stepped out of its direction or bent this way or that, in other words, he dodged. But all those who have read the life of David know that he was not lacking in prowess. David had faults, but cowardice was not one of them. When David, who was, I guess, about four feet and a half high, went out to meet the giant, who was, I guess, about ten feet high, it was a big undertaking, and the inequalities of the struggle were so great that it struck the giant's idea of the ludicrous, and he suggested to the little fellow that he would make a fine dinner for a buzzard or a jackal: "Come to me and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air and to the beasts of the field." When David went out to meet that giant and conquered him, he demonstrated, as he did on other occasions, his courage. But I am so glad that when Saul flung that javelin, David dodged it, or the chief work of his life would never have been done. What a lesson this is to those who go into useless danger and expose their lives or their reputations or their usefulness unnecessarily. When duty demands, go ahead, though all earth and hell oppose. Budge not one inch from the right position. But when nothing is involved, step back or step aside. Why stand in the way of perils that you can avoid? Go not into quixotic battles to fight wind-mills. You will be of more use to the world and the Church as an active Christian man than as a target for javelins. There are Christians always in a fight. If they go into churches they fight there. If they go into presbyteries or conferences or consociations they fight there. My advice to you is, if nothing is to be gained for God or the truth, stand out of the way of the javelins. 1. Sam. 18: 11, "David avoided out of his presence twice." Washington was as mighty in his retreats as in his advances. His army would several times have been destroyed if he had not dodged. He dodged on Long Island, he dodged on New Jersey Heights. Lincoln on his way to inauguration at Washington was waited for by assassins, but he took another train and dodged the desperadoes. We have high example of the fact that sometimes a man will serve God best by disappearing from this or that place, this or that environment. A mob brought Christ to the top of the rocks back of Nazareth. They did not like his preaching and they proposed to hurl him down the precipice. But while they were getting ready for the massacre, Christ darted into the crowd, and amid the confusion escaped to Capernaum, and continued exorcising devils and cooling fevers and filling fishnets and giving healthy circulation of blood to paralysis, and curing dementia, and turning corpses into living men and women, and doing his chief work. What a good thing he dodged the crowd on the rocks back of Nazareth! Likewise at Jerusalem one day, while he was sauntering up and down in Solomon's Porch waiting for an opportunity to say kind words or do a useful deed, the people proposed to pay him for his self-sacrifices by stoning him to death, but the record is "He escaped out of their hands."

See also in my subject the unreasonable attitude of javelin toward harp.

David Playing Before Saul.

What had that harp in David's hand done to the javelin in Saul's hand? Had the vibrating strings of the one hurt the keen edge of the other? Was there an old grudge between the two families of sweet sound and sharp cut? Had the triangle ever insulted the polished shaft? Why the deadly aim of the destroying weapon against the instrument of soothing, calming, healing sound? Well, I will answer that if you will tell me why the hostility of so many to the Gospel, why the virulent attacks against Christian religion, why the angry antipathy of so many to the most genial, most inviting, most salutary influence under all the heavens? Why will men give their lives to writing and speaking and warring against Christ and the Gospel? Why the javelin of the world's hatred and rage against the harp of heavenly love? You know and I know men who get wrathfully red in the face and foaming at the mouth and use the gesture of the clenched fist and put down their feet with indignant emphasis and invoke all sarcasm and irony and vituperation and scorn and spite at the Christian religion. What has the Christian religion done that it should be so assailed? Whom hath it bitten and left with hydrophobiac virus in their veins that it should sometimes be chased as though it were a maddened canine? To head off and trip up and push down and corner our religion was the dominant thought in the life of David Hume and Voltaire and Shaftesbury, and even the Earl of Rochester, until one day in a princely house, in which they blasphemously put God on trial, and the Earl of Rochester was the attorney against God and religion and received the applause of the whole company, when suddenly the Earl was struck under conviction, and cried: "Good God, that a man who walks uprightly, who sees the wonderful works of God and has the use of his senses and reason, should use them in defying his Creator! I wish I had been a crawling leper in a ditch rather than have acted toward God as I have done." Javelin of wit, javelin of irony, javelin of scurrility, javelin of sophistry, javelin of human and diabolic hostility, have been flying for hundreds of years, and are flying now. But aimed at what? At something that has come to devastate the world? At something that slays nations? At something that would maul and trample under foot and excruciate and crush the human race? No, aimed at the Gospel harp. Harp on which prophets played with somewhat lingering and uncertain fingers, but harp on which apostles played with sublime certainty, and martyrs played while their fingers were on fire. Harp that was dripping with the blood of the Christ, out of whose heart strings the harp was chorded and from whose dying groan the strings were keyed. Oh, gospel harp! All thy nerves a-tremble with stories of self-sacrifice. Harp thrummed by fingers long ago turned to dust. Harp that made heaven listen and will yet make all the earth hear. Harp that sounded pardon to my sinful soul and peace over the grave where my dead sleep. Harp that will lead the chant of the blood-washed throng redeemed around the throne. May a javelin slay me before I fling a javelin at that. Harp which it seems almost too sacred for me to touch, and so I call down from their thrones those who used to finger it, and ask them to touch it now. "Come down, William Cowper, and run your fingers over the strings of this harp." He says, "I will," and he plays:

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins.

"Come down, Charles Wesley, and touch the strings." He says, "I will," and he plays:

Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly.

"Come down, Augustus Toplady, and sweep your fingers across this Gospel harp." He says, "I will," and he plays:

Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

"Come down, Isaac Watts, and take this harp." He says, "I will," and he plays:

Alas! and did my Saviour bleed,
And did my Sovereign die.

"P. P. Bliss, come down, and thrum this Gospel harp." He says, "I will," and he plays:

Hallelujah, 'tis done,
I believe on the Son.

Ineffable harp! Transporting harp! Harp of earth! Harp of heaven! Harp saintly and seraphic! Harp of God! Oh, I like the idea of that old monument in the ancient church at Ullard, near Kilkenny, Ireland. The sculpture on that monument, though chiselled more than a thousand years ago, as appropriate today as then, the sculpture representing a harp upon a cross. That is where I hang it now, that is where you had better hang it. Let the javelin be forever buried, the sharp edge down, but hang the harp upon the cross.

And now upon our souls let the harps of heaven rain music, and as, when the sun's rays fall aslant in Switzerland, at the approach of eventide, and the shepherd among the Alps puts the horn to his lips and blows a blast, and says, "Glory be to God," and all the shepherds on the Alpine heights or down in the deep valleys respond with other blast of horns, saying, "Glory be to God," and then all the shepherds uncover their heads and kneel in worship, and after a few moments of silence some shepherd rises from his knees and blows another blast of the horn, and says, "Thanks be to God," and all through the mountains the response comes from other shepherds, "Thanks be to God," so this moment let all the valleys of earth respond to the hills of heaven, with sounds of Glory and Thanks, and it be harp of earthly worship to harp of heavenly worship, and the words of St. John in the Apocalypse be fulfilled: "I heard a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters and as the voice of a great thunder, and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps."

WON BY A CHILD'S KINDNESS.

THE family of a petty official at Berlin was recently treated to an agreeable surprise owing to the charitable disposition of the smallest member of their household—a three-year-old girl. During the month of May she met, sitting on a bench in a public square near her home, an old, poorly, but neatly clad man, who attracted her attention by his sad looks and lonesome air. Thinking he must be hungry, she stepped up to him and, with the question, "Want a piece of pie?" she resolutely handed him half of her simple lunch. The man appeared somewhat perplexed, but smilingly received the piece with thanks and ate it. From that day, both might be frequently together engaged in lively conversation, the little girl never forgetting to offer her old friend part of her lunch, which she was in the habit of eating in the open air after playing about the lawn, nor even admitting of any refusal on his part to take at least a little bit. At the beginning of the month, Hermine one morning returned home with the distressing news that the "poor" man had not appeared. Neither had he been seen for several days after, when Hermine's father received an unexpected summons to appear at court. Here he was told that the "poor old man," who really was a wealthy citizen of Berlin, had left his whole fortune to little Hermine. His will contained the following paragraph:

"I had despaired of the whole world, for those who were nearest and dearest to me had deceived me. Thus, I renounced all, for what I desired I was unable to obtain. I became a miser, because my liberality was only rewarded with ingratitude. Nearing the end of my course, I was mightily touched by a child's heart, which reconciled me with humanity. It was only for a short time; but if I had millions to bestow, those few moments would not be paid for too dearly. May my wealth serve my little friend for better ends than it did me, who never knew how to appreciate or to expend it."

THE EXCELLENT WOMAN.

S. S. Lesson for May 28. Prov. 31: 10-31 Golden Text, Prov. 31: 30. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE wise man asks: "Who can find a virtuous woman?" A woman after God's heart; one who comes up to his own ideal. Behold, this have I found, saith the Preacher, laying one thing to another to find out the account, which my soul still seeketh, but I have not found: one man among a thousand have I found, but a woman among all those have I not found (Eccles. 7: 27, 28, R.V.) And yet when the Lord Jesus could not find a disciple among the men who left all to follow him ready to understand his Cross, he found a woman who entered into his thought and who could anoint him for his burial. When not one of the twelve had understood his resurrection, there was nevertheless a woman who could come alone while it was yet dark unto the sepulchre, and whom he could make the apostle of his ascension to the apostles themselves. To a woman he committed the message: "Go to my brethren, and say to them: I ascend unto my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." (John 20: 17.)

It may be that under the law a virtuous man was easier to find than a virtuous woman, but the Cross of Christ changes all things: "There is neither male no female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." (Gal. 3: 28.) The Lord includes in himself both man and woman. Just as all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him (Col. 2: 9), so also all the fulness of humanity. The nearer a man's life approaches that of the Master, the more of true manliness is to be seen in him; and equally so, the nearer a woman's life is to the life of Jesus the more of true womanliness is manifest in her. The true man, moved by the temptation of the enemy from the position of "dominion" given in the creation to Adam, overcome by no subterfuge of those who sought to catch him in his words, silencing devil and man, so that neither had a word more to say, was yet womanly when he said: "I am among you as he that serveth." (Luke 22: 27), and in his touching the leper before he healed him by his Word. (Matt. 8: 3.)

The key to all which is said of the woman in our chapter is contained in the Golden Text:

"A Woman that Feareth the Lord,

she shall be praised;" i.e., a woman who has an eye to God in all which she does; the price of such an one "is far above rubies." "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her." Blessed is the man who knows that he will never be misguided by his wife! Blessed is the man who knows that she will never give him counsel which is not given in the fear of the Lord; that all which she says to him has first been received from heaven. A woman who brings God near to her husband, because she lives near to God and brings his presence with her is indeed a blessed woman. "She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life." She may not always please him: if she is true to God, she will rather risk her husband's displeasure than her God's: she will be true to her husband at any cost to herself. A woman that fears the Lord is a woman who puts God first. Oh! how many unhappy homes might be happy ones if the wife and mother were but true, if she did but know how to speak the truth in love, and if the husband and children would be willing to take, as from the Lord, what God has committed to a godly wife and mother! The pride of man makes him unwilling to learn from a woman, especially from his wife. And yet, perhaps the means whereby he can be most truly blest of God is just that which he rejects. A wife who dictates to her husband is not a woman that feareth the Lord, a woman who argues with her husband is not a woman that feareth the Lord, a woman who throws the responsibility of a worldly house upon her husband, one who excuses herself at her husband's expense, one who [illegible] her husband's faults or mistakes is not a woman that feareth the Lord. Yet again a woman who lets things go which she knows to be unpleasing to God in her husband's life, and fails in loving faithfulness to him, a woman who idolizes her husband and makes him, rather than the Word of God, her guide, is not a woman that feareth the Lord.

There is no relation of life so sacred, so blessed and yet so full of danger as the marriage relation. The precious opportunities of laying down self-will and yet the constant temptation to self-denial with a selfish object; the absolute necessity of constant, ceaseless prayer on the part of a wife if she would do him good and not evil all the days of her life. Prayer is equally useful on the part of a husband; but we are speaking here especially of the wife. A true wife is a painstaking wife: "she worketh willingly with her hands." That is a strange and unhealthy idea which makes some silly young women imagine that it is derogatory to those in a superior position to do anything with their hands beyond the few accomplishments which they have learned at school. They little know what slaves they are and how much of both health and pleasure they lose in this miserable idleness. They do not know the help work may be sometimes to an overburdened housemaid. A woman that feareth the Lord is everyone's willing servant, she has a quick eye to see the needs of everyone around her, and a ready hand to help. Not occupied with herself, it is easy to her to bring help and gladness to them, and she is welcome in houses where only one servant or perhaps none at all is kept, just because she never troubles anybody.

She "bringeth her food from afar," i.e., she is not negligent about the table. Those who are her guests will see a kindly thought for everyone in the provision: a remembrance of the old man whose teeth are gone, in something tender when he is there, the cup of tea covered quickly over when anyone is called away, that it may be found comfortably hot on his return. All these little attentions, though they may be found in worldly women, are sure to be found in a woman that feareth the Lord. Whatever hour others may rise, a woman that feareth the Lord is generally an early riser: "she riseth also while it is yet night." A woman's life,—especially when she has a family, an institution, a school, or is in any way specially occupied—is a life full of interruption. Her husband may have some of his time quite free, but if she is to be sure of time alone, she must take it from the night. A woman's early morning is a woman's strength for the day. Then she takes rest in her God, sits at his feet, hears his Word, brought home by the Spirit as she reads, and there she settles with him the questions which are likely to arise during the day, and puts in his hand all which is unforeseen.

But this does not make her idle. Our chapter speaks of the wise woman as being a good woman of business, in the field, and in various merchandise and manufacture. But this, not with the idea of amassing wealth; she stretches out her hands to the poor, and reaches forth her hands to the needy. She cares for the clothing as well as the provision of her household, it is her kingdom, but she is only steward there; she who feareth the Lord lets the government be upon his shoulder. And thus in dependence on him, she looketh well to the ways of her household, nothing unseemly is allowed there, the voice of gossip, the unkind word, cannot live in the atmosphere of "a woman that feareth the Lord."

"She shall rejoice in time to come." One cannot but be reminded of the words of Paul to Timothy: "Charge them that are rich in the world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they may be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life." (1. Tim. 6: 17-19.) If time, money, strength, is all laid out in the present with a view to the future, such sowing to the Spirit will most surely reap life everlasting, and so bring "rejoicing in time to come." "She openeth her mouth with wisdom, in her tongue is

The Law of Kindness."

This is a wonderful expression for the Old Testament, for surely this law of kindness is the royal law (James 2: 8): "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," which in the New Testament, and the teaching of our Lord, takes a wider range and culminates in love to enemies as well as neighbors; those who curse, hate, despitefully use, and persecute. The law of kindness supersedes: "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." The law of kindness overcomes evil with good, and hatred with love. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12: 34); the law of kindnesss must have conquered the heart, in order to rule the lips of the woman that feareth the Lord. How much more often is the law of unkindness than the law of kindness in the mouth even of God's children. Only a heart possessed by God, who is love, can rule the tongue by "the law of kindness."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

PLACED thus at the close of the Book of Proverbs, probably by a compiler who lived after the exile, is this exquisite picture of the good woman. In the original language it is an acrostic poem, each verse beginning with a different letter of the Hebrew alphabet in its order. The author is unknown. It is possible though not certain that it may be by the same author as the first nine verses of the chapter. But even so, we have no record of any king by the name of Lemuel. The name means "Dedicated to God," and is probably fictitious. The advice, however, is such as a wise mother might be expected to give a son who was liable to be attracted, as young men still are, by women of vain, frivolous character. They are not the kind to be desired, he is told, and then the picture of a really good woman is sketched in detail and we learn what qualities were in the author's opinion essential to his ideal. They are not such as we should expect to find in an Oriental's catalogue. "Beauty is vain;" the wife is not to be merely an ornament to the home. She "makes strong her arms;" does not pride herself on being frail and delicate. Her hands hold the distaff and spindle; she is not above doing manual work. She makes garments not only for her household, but for the market, she "delivereth girdles to the merchant." She has foresight for "she laugheth at the time to come," being prepared for emergencies. She has business tact and invests in real estate. She has the faculty of organization, and gives tasks to her maidens. She is not a scold; "the law of kindness is on her tongue." She is charitable; her hands are spread out to the poor. It is not necessary for her husband to make desperate efforts to raise money to meet extravagance at home; he has "no need of spoil," for he "doth safely trust in her." Such is the author's ideal of a good wife. Its conception of her position seems to be that of a confidential and faithful servant of her husband, rather than his companion. It indicated, however, a decided advance over the position of the wife in the polygamous society of the time. The picture is not exactly that drawn by men and women who in modern days advise young people about to enter the marriage relation. But even now the conditions of life have not so changed as to render the qualities here mentioned undesirable in a wife and the mistress of a household. The happiness and prosperity of her husband and those about her, depend more on her possession of those qualities than on her possession of many charms and accomplishments.

[illegible] willingly with her hands. Many people think it is degrading to do manual work. A student at Andover purchased some wood and tried to get some one to saw it for him. As he was a new comer at the University and did not know where to get any one to do the work, he finally went to Prof. Stuart and asked him if he knew of any man who would undertake it. The professor, who knew that the student was poor and felt sorry that he should spend in paying wages money that he would need for his education, replied, "Oh yes, I can find a man who will do it for you, but you will have to pay him for his time. Why not do it yourself and save the money?" The color rose to the student's cheeks. "I see your pride is hurt," said Professor Staurt; "you feel that work is beneath you. Well, never mind, I will saw the wood for you. I'm not proud and I can afford to do it for you for nothing." The student looked at him in amazement. "No," he said, "if you are not ashamed to do it, I need not be. I'll do it myself."

She stretcheth out her hand to the poor. She was kind and sympathetic. Charity may be done in different ways. Some people when they give to the poor fling their gifts out in a patronizing way to people at a distance. There is no sympathy in the act. The hand should be stretched out in kindness and love and with a friendly grasp. It need not be loaded down with gifts in order to find a response. A Christian minister tells us in his interesting book Christianity between Sundays that one of the most helpful people in his city lives in a back street, in an unpleasant neighborhood, in a small house. Everybody in that neighborhood knows her, and she knows them and their children. They go to her with their troubles and she gives them her sympathy. As for money, she would give them that too if she had any to give. She gives herself. The whole street is better because she lives on it.

Not afraid of the snow for her household. A naturalist relates an incident, which came under his own observation, showing how a bird displayed an instinct very like the wisdom of the good woman. He says: In front of a window where I worked last summer was a butternut tree. A humming bird built her nest on a limb that grew near the window, and we had an opportunity to watch her closely, as we could look right into the nest from the window. One day there was a very heavy shower coming up, and we thought we would see if she covered her young during the storm; but when the first drops fell she came and took in her bill one of the large leaves growing close to the nest, and laid this leaf over it so it completely covered the nest. Then she flew away. On looking at the leaf, we found a hole in it; and in the side of the nest was a small stick that the leaf was fastened to or hooked on. After the storm was over, the old bird came back and unhooked the leaf, and the nest was perfectly dry. In building her nest she must have taken into account that storms would come and have provided the stick for just such an emergency.

She maketh fine linen and selleth it. This good woman was in business and she made a profit on it. Some people think that a Christian cannot be a good business man and a good Christian at the same time. Dr. George Hodges, of Pittsburg, Pa., recently wrote to a number of business men asking them whether in their opinion it was possible to succeed in business if they conducted their business on Christian principles. Among the replies, was one in which the writer said: "It is not only possible, but, as a rule, most profitable, to do business on Christian principles; and I cannot admit for one moment that those principles antagonize legitimate business as the world is now constituted." Another wrote: "In my judgment it is impossible to succeed in business without Christian principles, except temporarily. It is not only not impossible to do business on Christian principles, but absolutely necessary. A man who does to another in business any different than he would be done by, is not looked upon as a first class business man."

In her tongue the law of kindness. That would make her own life pleasant and would be pleasant for all about her. Employers, both men and women often fail to get the best service because they alienate their employees by harsh, bitter words. A kind word has often unconsciously won the love and gratitude of some desolate heart. A city business man stopped to buy a newspaper from a wizened, shrieking newsboy one morning. He spoke kindly to him as was his habit and the incident passed from his mind, but he noticed afterward when he was in the same locality a boy following him with a wistful face. "Do you know me?" he asked at last. The wretched little Arab laughed. "No; but you called me 'my chile' one day. I'd like to do something for you sir. I thought before that I was nobody's child." Christian men and women may do much towards saving the neglected little one who feels he is "nobody's child," teaching him, as no money can do, that we are all children of one Father. When Christ would heal or help the poor outcast he did not send him money; but he came close and touched him.

ONE WEEK MORE OF THE FUND.

A Hearty and Generous Final Effort Now will Place the Brooklyn Tabernacle Beyond all Danger—Contributions Still Flowing in.

CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Brooklyn Tabernacle

WITHIN two weeks from the date of this issue, THE Emergency Fund must close. If, when that time arrives, the response to Rev. Dr. Talmage's appeal, made through these columns, has not been such as will accomplish the object in view—the extinction of the floating debt—every dollar contributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be returned to the senders forthwith.

But we are hopeful that in the fortnight which still remains, there may be such spontaneous and substantial evidence of sympathy by the friends of the Christian religion in all parts of the Union, as will forever dispel the danger of the Tabernacle passing under the control of those who would sacrilegiously transform it to other than a temple of worship. During the week a large number of contributions have been received, and are acknowledged below. These came with such showers of blessing and fervent invocation, that we are encouraged to believe that there are thousands of others who will not permit the final appeal to pass unanswered.

"Shall the Lord's House be Sold?"

I.

CHRIST, give us faith to say
Thy love shall win the day;
Give us Thy grace.
Make hearts unite and melt,
Save where in tears we've knelt,
And Thy sweet presence felt.
Lord, save this place!

II.

Shall the Lord's house be sold?
More precious far than gold:
In His dear eye.
The place that gathers in Souls from the ways of sin,
Out of earth's dark, to win
A crown on high!

III.

Men! can you let it go?
Here, Christ the Lord, doth show
Mercy and love
Ne'er will its influence cease,
Till earth has found release,
And over all God's peace,
Broods like a dove!

IV.

Save it! Ye men who can!
Save it! to fallen man!
For Jesus' sake.
He, in great love, did die
In shame and agony,
That with Him, you and I
Our home might make.

V.

Oh! rescue His abode! Oh! lift the heavy load From His dear home.
Let not His banner fall. It is the Master's call: Oh! answer one and all.
"Our King, we come!" N. M. CARTER.

THE DIVINE SHADOW.

MANY people have found this world a desert-march. They go half consumed of trouble all their days. But we are not turned out on a desert to die. Here is the long, cool, certain, refreshing shadow of the Lord.

A tree, when in full leafage, drops a great deal of refreshment; but in a little while the sun strikes through, and you keep shifting your position, until, after a while, the sun is set at such a point that you have no shade at all. But go in the heart of some great rock, such as you see in Yosemite or the Alps, and there is everlasting shadow. There has been thick shade there for six thousand years, and will be for the next six thousand. So our divine Rock, once covering us, always covers us. The same yesterday, to-day and forever! always good, always kind, always sympathetic! You often hold a sunshade over your head passing along the road or a street; but after a while your arm gets tired, and the very effort to create the shadow makes you weary. But the rock in the mountains, with fingers of everlasting stone, holds its own shadow. So God's sympathy needs no holding up from us. Though we are too weak from sickness or trouble to do anything but lie down, over us he stretches the shadow of his benediction.

It is our misfortune that we mistake God's shadow for the night. If a man come and stand between you and the sun, his shadow falls upon you. So God sometimes comes, and stands between us and worldly successes, and his shadow falls upon us, and we wrongly think that it is night. As a father in a garden stoops down to kiss his child the shadow of his body falls upon it; and so many of the dark misfortunes of our life are not God going away from us, but our heavenly Father stooping down to give us the kiss of his infinite and everlasting love. It is the shadow of a sheltering Rock, and not of a devouring lion.

SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS

M[illegible] was very unhealthy. It seemed a terrible distemper that killed every boy and girl that it touched. If I found myself some day better than common, I corrected the mistake, for fear I should die, although it was the general opinion that I was not in much danger of over-sanctity. But I do believe that children may have religion and yet live through it. A [illegible] of peeac will do marvels. Timothy lived to grow up, and we are credibly informed that little Samuel woke. Indeed, the best boys I ever saw occasionally upset things and got boisterous and had the fidgets. The goody-goody kind of children make namby-pamby men. I should not be surprised to find that a colt which does not frisk becomes a horse that will not draw. It is not religion that makes that boy sit by the stove while his brothers are out snow-balling; but the "dumps." The boy who has no fire in his nature may, after he has grown up, have animation enough to grease a wagon-wheel, but he will not own the wagon nor have money enough to buy the grease. The best boy I ever knew, before he went to heaven, could strike a ball till it soared out of sight, and in the race, far as you could see, you would see his red tippet coming out ahead. Look out for the boy who never has the fingers of a good laugh tickle him under the diaphragm. The most solemn-looking mule on our place had kicked to pieces five dashboards.

There are parents who notice that their daughter is growing pale and sick, and therefore think that she must be destined to marry a missionary and go to Borneo, although the only recommendation she has for that position is that she will never be any temptation to the cannibals, who, while very fond of cold missionary, are averse to diseased meat; or, finding their son looking cadaverous, think he is either going to die or become a minister, considering that there is great power of consecration in liver complaint, and thinking him doubly set apart who, while Presbytery are laying their hands on his head, has dyspepsia laying its hands on his stomach.

Oh, for a religious literature that shall take for its model of excellence a boy that loves God and can enjoy his dinner. Be not afraid to say, in your account of his decease, that the day before you lost him, he caught two rabbits in his trap down on the meadow, or soundly thrashed a street-ruffian who was trying to upset a little girl's basket of cold victuals. I do not think that heaven is so near to an illy-ventilated nursery as a good gymnasium. If the Church of God could trade off three thousand hogsheads of religious cant for three thousand hogsheads of fresh air and stout health, we should be the gainers, but the fellow with whom we traded would be cheated mercilessly and forever.

WEALTH HAS WINGS.

"Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." Proverbs 23: 5.

"He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end shall be a fool." Jere. 17: 11.

MONEY is a golden-breasted bird with silver beak. It alights on the office-desk, or in the counting-room, or on the parlor centre-table. Men and women stand and admire it. They do not know that it has wings larger than a raven's, larger than a flamingo's, larger than an eagle's. One wave of the hand of misfortune and it spreads its beautiful plumage and is gone—"as an eagle toward heaven," though sometimes I think it goes in the other direction!

Remember that the man who gets his gain by iniquity will soon lose it all. One moment after his departure from life, he will not own an opera house, he will not own a certificate of stock.

Stand close by Christ, and Christ will stand close by you. The greater the temptation, the more magnificent the reward. But, alas! for the stock-gambler—what will he do in the judgment? That day will settle everything. That to the stock-gambler will be a "break" at the "first call." No smuggling into heaven. No "collaterals" on which to trade your way in. Go in through Christ, the Lord, or you will forever stay out.

After you have done your last day's work on earth, and the hushed assembly stands around with bowed heads at your obsequies, God forbid that the most appropriate text for your funeral oration should be "As a partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end he shall be a fool."

Price of many a crime untold,
Gold, gold, gold, gold.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in frequent receipt of letters from very needy persons in different parts of the country, some of the cases being pitiful in the extreme. These applications are so numerous as to be altogether beyond our capacity for extending relief. Among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there are doubtless many benevolent people who would be pleased to be put in communication with some of these deserving poor ones. If any of our readers so charitably disposed, would send us their names and addresses for this special purpose, we will send to each one letter a year and no more, from some needy person who has appealed for help. All letters relating to business of this nature should be addressed to "The Relief Box," CHRISTIAN HERALD Office.

Mrs. C. F. Nickelson, Sherburn, Minn. Where in the Bible is the passage about being foolishly good?

You probably have reference to Ecc. 7:16,17.

John Lant, Whittlesly, O. When was meat first ordered to be eaten?

See Gen. 9: 3.

Mrs. H. Williams, Harlem, O. I have never been able to find in the Book of Job where one of his children was killed, called before he did?

See Job 1: 18, 19.

Reader, Jersey City, N. J. Where is the W.C.T.U., at Somerset Park, Fla., situated?

The proper address is Somerset Park, Lake Helen, Fla.

Reader, Pilgrim Lake, Texas. Is the Red Cross Society a Roman Catholic institution?

Decidedly not. It is Christian and humanitarian, and belongs to no sect or denomination.

W. P. Corwin, Altoona, Pa. Is it true that New England still sends great quantities of rum to Africa?

Boston exporters send about 500,000 gallons of liquor to Africa annually. The fact is lamentable and a disgrace to Christian America.

Ephraim S. Dyer, Truro, Mass. Is Dr. Talmage the author of the book entitled "The Life of Christ, or From Manger to Throne," or is it extracts taken from his sermons?

Dr. Talmage is the author. He wrote the book while abroad on his Palestine tour in 1889, the entire volume being practically completed in M.S. before his return to America.

Subscriber Mass. Will you tell me the name of the author of the lines:

Christ never asks of us such busy labor,
As leaves no time for resting at his feet;
The waiting attitude of expectation
He oftimes counts as service most complete.

Some reader may be able to indicate the authorship of the foregoing verse.

Jas. Renfew, Germantown, Pa. When was the discovery of "Vinland" made by the Norsemen?

All that exists concerning it is traditional. Ari, a Norse author, who first wrote about it, lived about 1100, and even then it was only a tradition, and had been so for probably a century or more. The date is approximately fixed as about 1000 A. D.

Alex. Porter, Elmira, N. Y. Talking with a temperance friend recently, he suggested, half seriously, that it would be a good idea for the liquor element to have a celebration of Paracelsus this year simultaneously with the Columbian Celebration. What did he mean?

He probably referred to the fact that Paracelsus, the famous chemist who is said to have discovered alcohol, was born 400 years ago, and also that Paracelsus, although he claimed divine properties for alcohol and called it "the elixir of life," himself died a sot—the victim of his own discovery.

Leland M. Haight, Bangall, N. Y., 1. Who were the [illegible] of the Psalms of David were written? 2. Were the Psalms sung by [illegible] in religious services?

1. Asaph was one of David's chief musicians; the sons of Korah; Heman (1 Chron. 15, 16); Ethan the Levite of Meraris' family whom David made chief musician along with Asaph and Heman. (1. Chron. 15: 44; 25: 1, 6.) 2. The Psalms were sung by those persons in religious services, also by the Levites. (II. Chron. 29, 30.)

Francis P. Griffith, La Grange, Ind. Thanks be to God, his commandment did triumph over the powers of darkness, and Congress ordained that the World's Fair should be closed on Sunday. But with what persistence did the agents of sin urge every conceivable argument, to resist God's law and desecrate his Sabbath. All the secular papers of Chicago, members of Congress, World's Fair officials, and even men professing godliness were anxious to evade, or violate Jehovah's edict. But against all sophistry and craft, in favor of Sunday opening, God's great sentence rose up, stood out in bold and grand utterance, and commanded attention; and the consciences of our servants, the law-making power, came up to the line in obedience to God.

G. C. Waterman, Brickfield, Me. The verses which accompany this were composed by a drum-major under the following circumstances: He was connected with a regiment during the revolutionary war. Wishing to visit his family, he applied for a furlough which was granted on condition that he compose a song and set it to music. These verses with others were the result. Can any of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD supply the missing verses, and give the name of the author?

A soldier, Lord, thou hast me made,
Thou art my Captain, King, and Head;
And under thee I mean to fight
The fight of faith with all my might.
Grant me the weapons of thy Word,
The spirit's powerful two-edged sword,
To slay thy foes whoe'er they be
And own the victory won by thee.
The cross, all stained with hallowed blood,
The ensign of our conquering God,
And when our General shall come
With sound of trumpet, not of drum,
'Tis then our well-dressed ranks shall stand
In full review at God's right hand;
And when our foes are put to rout
And Jesus wheels them left about,
Then we'll march up the heavenly street
And ground our arms at Jesus feet.

Possibly some of our readers can give the information desired.

Citizen, Milwaukee, Wis. When the Saviour was crucified, did all the weight of his body rest on the spikes that were driven through his hands and feet, or did his feet rest on some block or projection? If it did not, would not the spikes have torn through the flesh?

In crucifixions, it was customary to attach to the cross a projection or seat, upon which the weight of the body could partially rest. This was done probably less from motives of humanity than with the view of prolonging the agony.

Benj. Nicholson, Towle, Cal. 1. Is it right or not to use the Lord's Prayer in this dispensation? A friend here says it is wrong for us to pray for God's kingdom to come; that we have the kingdom within us already. 2. What is your opinion on the doctrines of the Salvation Army?

1. It is entirely right to use it. The Lord's Prayer is the most perfect of all petitions, embracing every possible want, temporal and spiritual, and suited to every clime, age and circumstance. In the sense conveyed, the Kingdom will not come till the millennium dawns. 2. We have no criticism other than approval. The Salvation Army is doing an excellent work in a field not reached by the organized churches and which has hitherto been left exclusively to the evangelists and home missionary workers.

W. Bradford Williams, Philadelphia. Is there any ground, other than the Book of Job, on which the fact of Job's having lived, could be proven? Is the name of Job's wife anywhere given?

Job is also mentioned in Ezekiel 14: 14-20 and James 5: 11. In the Greek translation of the Septuagint he is mentioned as Jobab, king of Edom. This, in turn, is declared to be translated from a Syrian book which states that Job dwelt in Austites on the confines of Idumea and Arabia; that he married an Arabian woman (name not given) and that his eldest son's name was Ennon. He himself was a son of Zare, one of the sons of Esau, and his mother was Bosorra. He was the fifth in descent from Abraham the patriarch. Job's tomb is still shown to Oriental tourists. The Talmud maintains that he was a veritable historical character. There are many writers, however, who hold that the character and experiences of Job were created by the author, and that the book is a parable.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE FINANCIAL STORM.

SEVERAL large failures in Wall Street on May 4, produced an excitement that approached a panic. Since the Secretary of the Treasury announced that there was a possibility under certain circumstances of the Government suspending gold payments, there has been an indisposition on the part of the banks to lend money on a particular class of securities. The stringency embarrassed speculators and trust companies, who have depended on securing loans on easy terms. One of the latter, which borrows largely during a part of the year and repays during the other part, when its product is chiefly sold, had recently made a change in its financial arrangements, with a view to avoid the recurring loans. The change was regarded in financial circles as an admission of weakness and the price of its shares fell with unprecedented rapidity. Other companies which are practically monopolies were also affected. They were chiefly combinations which have taken over the business of prosperous firms and by absorbing or driving out of business their competitors, have obtained the control of the trade in sugar and other commodities. While the directors and principal shareholders were undoubtedly wealthy men there was widespread distrust in the stability of the combinations and the value of their securities decreased enormously. The sudden depreciation caused the failure of several large houses. A few days previously they were accounted rich by themselves and others, but as their wealth consisted largely of the securities, which, in the crisis, they could neither sell, nor use as collateral, they were unable to meet their engagements. The Bible warns us that the time is coming when all wealth will prove similarly unavailable. "Riches profit not in the day of wrath; but righteousness delivereth from death." (Prov. 11: 4.)

A Consul's Enemies.

AN amusing report to the Washington Government has been received from Dr. Edward Bedloe who is now United States Consul at Amoy, China. Expecting that the new Administration will soon replace him by a Democrat, Dr. Bedloe has made preparations for leaving his post and has made an inventory of the furniture at the consulate, belonging to the Government. The only article, he says, that he can report as being in an undamaged condition is the iron safe. Every wooden article is the prey of white ants. The grub is no larger than a fine needle when it enters the wood but it thrives and grows until it becomes five times as large as the garden ant. By that time it has eaten its way deep into the article of furniture it has attacked and it then begins to eat its way outward. When it emerges it makes a hole a quarter of an inch in diameter. It leaves the wood a mere honeycomb. Millions of the creatures are in the consulate. Chairs, tables, bookcases, racks, doors, windows, and the flooring have been eaten away and have collapsed without warning and have had to be replaced. Dr. Bedloe says he knows that the ants are busy inside a dozen articles of furniture in the house but he can do nothing to prevent their ravages and must patiently wait the end of them. Happily we have no such pest in this country, but we have many examples of similar ravages in moral character. Many a man, whose character, like the furniture in the consulate, has seemed to be solid and substantial has by its sudden collapse showed that it must have long been a hollow mockery undermined by secret sin. (Matt. 23: 27.)

Invoking the Fetich.

DURING his travels among the tribes of the West Coast of Africa, DeBrazza, the French explorer and geographer, encountered many striking instances of native superstition and idolatry. He relates that on one occasion, while traveling in the Adouma country, his party was greatly delayed by the failure of a petty chief to keep his promise of furnishing a pirogue and native rowers to enable the voyagers to pass the rapids of a river, which they dare not attempt in their own small boat. Arguments were unavailing, and even threats seemed ineffectual to secure the desired assistance. At last, the chief consented to send his two sons on to a large village some distance ahead, with a message from the explorers, and he announced, that the fetich, or idol of the tribe, should be consulted. The ceremony of invoking the fetiches was a peculiar one. The chief took a chicken and slaughtered it to awake the spirits and then demanded advice. This request, which it was supposed would be aided by his ancestors, was supplemented by the gift of a dish of bananas, which, it was hoped, would bring a favorable answer. The young men of the tribe took locks of their hair and tied them around the ankles and wrists, and imitated the gestures and actions of the chief, their father. Afterward these locks were all tied up together in a package and placed with much ceremony in the hut of the fetich. The voyagers had nothing to fear and, as it afterwards proved, the "response" must have been construed as favorable, for the party were shortly enabled to continue their journey and ultimately reached in safety their white friends, who had been waiting with impatience the news of the expedition. The illustration on this page represents the ceremony of invocation as it was performed in the idol hut. Although we hold in deserved contempt such means of prognosticating the success or failure of an enterprise, the equally silly belief in luck and omens is not at all uncommon. In cases of doubt and perplexity few remember the prophet's injunction when warning his people against wizards he said: "Should not a people seek unto their God?" (Isa. 8: 19.)

THE INVOCATION OF THE FETICHES IN THE ADOUMA COUNTRY, AFRICA.

A Benefaction Thwarted.

THE World's Fair managers have missed a large addition to their funds through an unpleasant dispute. It was announced recently that the famous pianist, Paderewski, would give two concerts at the Fair, and present the proceeds to the treasury, as a mark of his gratitude for the reception he had met in this country. Estimating the probable receipts, on the basis of those at the concerts he has given in New York and other cities, it was evident that the profit to the Fair would be at least five thousand dollars, as Paderewski had undertaken to pay all the expenses. When, however, it was learned that he would play on his own piano, and that the piano had been made by a firm who did not exhibit at the Fair, an objection was raised. One journal went so far as to charge the pianist with being merely an advertising agent of the piano manufacturer, and that the firm was thus seeking to advertise their instrument by a ruse. It was ultimately decided that the distinguished stranger might play on his own instrument, but the dispute had been so painful, and so many insulting remarks had been made, that Paderewski declared he could not play. His nerves had been strained, and his sensitive temperament had suffered so severely under the unjust suspicions published, that he would be unable to do himself justice, and he must withdraw his offer. This he did, and on May 6 he left the country without doing the graceful service he hoped to have done. It is a pity that the benefaction was lost, but the disposition through which it was lost is by no means uncommon, and it often manifests itself in religion. Men often lose the greatest of all blessings because it is not offered in their way. They would be willing to purchase salvation or work for it, but they will not gain it by simple faith and the renunciation of themselves, which is God's way. (II. Kings 5: 13.)

A Fugitive Criminal Caught.

A REMARKABLE case of detection was reported in New York on May 3. A policeman on duty in Broome Street noticed an excited man beckoning to him. On inquiring what the trouble was, the policeman learned that the man was a Russian who had just seen a compatriot enter a store, and wanted the policeman to arrest him. He was so much in earnest and his story was so coherent that the policeman arrested the man and took him before a judge. He had arrived in New York only three days previously and appeared much surprised by his arrest. His accuser charged him with murder. He said that he had received a letter from a friend in Russia stating that his uncle had been murdered eight weeks ago at Drodney in Russia, by this man, whom he had known well before coming to this country. He was much distressed by the news, but being unable to return to Russia he had no hope of bringing his uncle's murderer to justice. To his amazement, however, he recognized the criminal in New York and had caused his arrest. The accused man denied that he had ever seen his accuser before and declared himself innocent of the crime. Under pressure, however, he broke down and admitted his guilt. He said that the murdered man had ruined him by causing his ejectment from his farm and, knowing him to be possessed of a large sum of money, he had killed him and escaped to America. To his astonishment, he had come to the very city where lived the man most concerned in having him punished. It is strange that men and women who have fallen into grievous sin are not afraid of making a similar blunder when they resolve on committing suicide. They put away from them the opportunity of repentance and pardon, and rush unbidden into the presence of God who has declared that he will punish sin. (Heb. 12: 29.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The last session for this season of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy will be held on Monday June 5 in the Hamilton Hall of Columbia College. Dr. D. H. Greer and Prof. Edward North are the speakers.

The statistics of the Moravian Church in the United States for the year ending December 31st, 1892, show that there are in the five districts into which the Church is divided 12,161 communicants and 1,229 non-communicants. There is an increase in the former of 182, and a decrease in the latter of 100.

The union meetings held by Dr. L. W. Munhall at Bethlehem, Pa., were very successful. Beside the regular preaching service every evening, cottage meetings were held daily in eight different districts for Bible study and prayer. At the first Sunday evening service 440 persons signed cards expressing their desire to begin the Christian life.

Subscribers wishing to send their copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where they will do good, may be glad to hear that Chaplain J. M. Crocker, of the Penitentiary, Anamosa, Iowa, would be pleased to receive them and distribute them among the prisoners. He says that he has found no literature so useful, so beneficial, or so eagerly welcomed by the prisoners as this journal.

Dr. Wm. Lawrence who has been chosen as successor to the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, is Dean of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, Mass. He is forty-three years of age and graduated from Harvard in 1871. He was rector of Grace Church, Lawrence, Mass., before taking office in the University.

Among the Evangelists who have gone to assist in Mr. Moody's Evangelization work during the World's Fair are Major D. W. Whittle, Mr. Wm. Robertson of Edinburgh, Mr. George C. Stebbins and Lord Chas. Bennet, son of the Earl of Tankerville, who was converted under Mr. Moody's preaching in London.

At the recent meeting of the managers of the Bible Society it was announced that Dr. L. N. Wheeler the Society's agent in China had died suddenly. The appropriations made by the Board included aid to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church for work in Germany and Switzerland, the Evangelical Society of Geneva for Bible work in France, the Bible Society's Committee in Japan, and to the society's agencies in Persia and China.

The Rev. J. F. Carson has accepted the invitation of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union to give talks on the International Lesson to Sunday School teachers on Saturday afternoons in the Y. M. C. A., 502 Fulton Street.

Recent reports of the mortality of British troops in India, covering a division of five thousand men, show that the mortality of the free drinkers was 44 per thousand; of moderate drinkers, 23 per thousand and of teetotalers, 11 per thousand.

The American Home Missionary Society has had the most successful year since its organization, sixty-seven years ago. Its total receipts from all sources, up to April 1, were $739,841.39. This sum is $77,052.11 in excess of the receipts of the preceding year and frees the Society from debt.

Rev. Frank Talmage, the son of the editor of this journal, was ordained on May 7, in Olivet Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Dr. Talmage preached the ordination sermon. A vast crowd gathered in front of the church long before the hour of service and, after the large church was filled, fully two thousand persons were outside who had been unable to gain admission. Dr. Talmage made a short address to them from the steps, before preaching to the people inside the church. Dr. A. G. McAuley, Dr. Henry C. McCook, and Dr. L. Y. Graham, pastor of the church, took part in the exercises. Dr. Graham's son, the Rev. Ralph L. Graham, was ordained at the same time.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

ZEALOUS SERVICE FOR GOD.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, May 14, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

"Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord." Romans 12: 11.

THE Bible is an intensely practical book. It is full of common-sense. It does not contain specific rules for the government of our conduct. Manifestly it could not. The Arabian commentators of Mohammed, being desirous of furnishing a rule for every situation in life, prepared a book containing seventy-five thousand directions; but it was soon found that cases occurred for which no rule of the entire number was applicable. The Bible follows another method; it lays down broad principles of everlasting righteousness, and it gives us wisdom to understand and grace to apply these principles. These principles, like all God's commandments, are "exceeding broad." They confront the merchant and his customers, the employer and the employed, the physician and his patient, the lawyer and his client, the pastor and his people.

The practical character of the Bible is finely illustrated in the relation between this chapter and the one which precedes it. In that chapter we have a statement of some of the important doctrines of Christianity; in this chapter we have a dissertation on some of the important duties of Christianity. Religion is intended to beautify and to glorify life. It is not a series of speculations, it is rather a system of obligations. It is designed not simply to inform our minds, but also and chiefly to reform our lives. We have in this chapter many pithy and practical directions—the application of the doctrinal teaching of the previous chapter. The apostle reminds us that the faith which justifies, works by love; that although God prepares in his free grace the highway to heaven, it is walked in only by those who walk in truth and love. We have in the text a threefold direction to guide our activity in daily duties.

Diligence in Duty.

The first direction is, "Not slothful in business." A little explanation may be necessary in regard to the word here rendered "business." In the eighth verse of this chapter the same word is translated "diligence." It might with propriety be so rendered here. "In diligence not slothful." It denotes ardor or intensity of mind, and then industry or labor. Religion is always the friend of industry. Paul in writing his second letter to the Thessalonians, third chapter and tenth verse, says, "For when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat." The evil complained of here began to show itself even while the apostle was with the church. Some were idlers and needed Paul to rebuke them and to incite them to labor. He was himself a remarkable example of industry. Often did he spend the day in preaching and teaching, and then labor far into the night at his "craft," rather than be dependent on the bounty of others. He becomes righteously indignant at the Thessalonian idlers. They were not to be supported by the charity of others, unless they had done all they could for their own support. At the very dawn of human history we are taught that man was to earn his bread in the sweat of his face. A man who will not work ought to starve. You ought not to help him. Aid [illegible]

Labor Demanded.

It is easy to learn the lessons which God would teach us in the light of these truths. He has no place, at least no good place, in [illegible] Here all God's servants do what their hands find to do with all their might; there the redeemed are "before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple." It is [illegible] industrious, as it is to read the Bible and to pray. Labor is not so much God's curse as it is God's blessing. A true Christian is to be more attentive to his duties than the most [illegible] street." Whatever is right in business, that a Christian is to do with all his might; whatever [illegible] edly avoid. He ought not to let anyone pass him on the line of honest endeavor. A lazy Christian, whether in business or religion, must greatly try God's patience.

Experience and observation abundantly prove the truth and wisdom of these Bible teachings The Italian proverb says: "He who labors is tempted by one devil, he who is idle is tempted by a thousand devils." It may be a bad thing to have too many irons in the fire—although Dr. Adam Clarke did not think so—but it is a great deal worse to have no irons in the fire. An idle man is to be profoundly pitied. Our greatest American preacher has said: "It is not work that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy; you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear.

Worry is Rust

upon the steel blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction." Luther could preach daily while he was burdened with "the care of all the churches;" at the same time he attended to a correspondence which fills many volumes, and was also engaged in bitter controversies with the ablest men of their day. Similar things are told of Calvin. He wrote his "Institutes," which have so profoundly affected the thought of the world, before he was twenty-seven. While he was at Strasburg, he preached or lectured daily. In Geneva his labors were even greater; there he was pastor, professor, and almost magistrate. He carried on an extensive correspondence with learned men in almost all parts of Europe. He wrote many volumes, and was at the same time a constant sufferer from infirmities of the flesh. Wesley often preached three times a day; one sermon was sometimes preached before the break of day to the hard-working miners meeting in the valleys and on the hill-sides of England. In addition he could ride forty miles a day and make a sermon or two in the saddle. Men seldom die of hard work. Bad methods of work, allowing work to drive us instead of our driving it, late hours and spasmodic efforts—these and similar bad habits often prove fatal. Honest work in any department of life's activity is God's medicine for men. Intense activity, physical, mental, and spiritual, is the only salvation of some Christians.

The Divine Worker.

Christ was one of the most intense workers that ever trod this earth. He worked right up to the measure of his strength; often he seems to have reached the point of fatigue and exhaustion. He lay down to sleep that night on his hard pillow on the stem of the little fishing-boat as thoroughly tired as was ever any laboring man in this audience. He sleeps the sleep of weariness, although the rain beat upon his face, the lightning flashes over the lake, and the thunder roars among the hills. He sleeps until the cry of despair reaches him, then he rises in his might and majesty, rebukes the loud storm and hushes the wild waves. Mark is the Evangelist who especially speaks of Christ as the mighty worker. The earlier chapters of this gospel frequently contain the words, straightway, immediately, forthwith and anon, as translations of one word, indicating intense earnestness in work. These chapters give us the idea of the utmost activity on the part of Christ as he presses forward to his great work.

An idle life puts a man into antagonism with nature and nature's God. Such a life cannot, like the divine life in the heart, "Spring up into everlasting life;" it must either stagnate or freeze. The highest genius is willingness and ability to do hard work. Any other conception of genius makes it a doubtful, if not a dangerous possession. Buffon said, "Genius is patience." William Carey, our distinguished Baptist missionary, explained the secret of his marvelous progress, from being a shoemaker to becoming the founder of the Baptist mission at Serampore, Professor of Sanscrit and Bengalu at the College of Fort William, and translator of the Scriptures into several Oriental languages, when he said, "I can plod." Good work will tell. Young men don't whine; don't complain that you are not appreciated. If you are capable of filling a high place, go up and fill it. Who will hinder you? The world wants such men. God wants such men, and he will reach down his hand and say, "Come up higher." John Ruskin says, "It is only by labor that thoughts can be made healthy; and only by thoughts that labor can be made happy, and the two cannot be separated with impunity." Thus all experience and observation, the Law of God in his Word and in his work, and the example alike of Christ and the Father, emphasize this part of our text—"Not slothful in business."

Fervor in Spirit.

The second part of the Apostle's direction is "fervent in spirit." This fervor is the divine fire which kindles the sacrifices of diligent toil, and carries upward the offering of a sweet-smelling savor. Religious work is pleasing to God only as the human spirit is moved upon by the divine Spirit. God demands that we worship him in spirit and in truth. All true labor for the glory of God is worship. A holy zeal must mark all our deeds of service. Communion with God is to be maintained amid the din of Broadway and the excitement of Wall Street. The world is not to quench the holy fire in a Christian's heart; but that fire is to kindle a flame in the world's heart. If your business freezes your religion, either your business must be very bad, or your religion is very poor. Your religion ought not simply to keep your business from freezing it, but it ought to warm up your business. This religious fervor will make you more successful even in your business. True religion will arouse every element of manhood in your soul; it will summon into activity every dormant faculty, and will start you with rapid steps in the line of noble achievement. Do not tell me that you have been a less successful clerk, partner, or professional man, because you are a Christian. Do not plead neglect of business obligations because of attendance upon religious duties. The somewhat erratic Dr. Cumming—to whom I am indebted for some suggestions—says: "Like the ancient patriarch, you will go out with your sacks to get corn, and will return with the sack filled with the corn; and you will find hid in the sack, not literally a golden cup, as he did, but something more precious than all—a full sack filled with this world's success, and buried in the midst of it the blessing that maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow."

Religion Pays.

Many of the rich men in New York to-day are as distinguished for their piety as for their wealth. "How can I make the most of myself?" This is a fair question for any one to ask. We travel this road but once. If at the close of life we are compelled to write over that life "failure," the sad record must remain forever; we have no second chance. The Christian's answer is the true one. If there were no future life it would pay to be a Christian. He has the highest joys even here, and the highest hopes which the future world can give him; and in the world to come he has a crown, and a throne and bliss which can neither be expressed nor conceived. Look at the nations of the world! To-day America and Britain march side by side to the high places of the earth. These English-speaking and Protestant nations rule the world to-day. The mercantile enterprise and progressive civilization of the world obey their voice and follow their steps. Wherever they tread the plants of ignorance and superstition die, and the flowers of liberty and religion bloom. The world to-day is at their feet, because they to-day, as nations, are at the feet of Jesus. Thus it will even be true that fervor in Christian spirit, and success in mercantile enterprise, will go side by side. This is true of individuals and of nations. If Christ be in a man's heart, industry will be in his hand, and in the end success will crown the labor of his life.

The Man of Influence.

This fervor of spirit is needful to the highest success in Christian work. If it be wanting, that success will be wanting also. Its possession gives many a man irresistible power, its absence robs some men of nearly all power. We have often been reminded that Cranmer and Ridley were much more learned scholars than Bishop Latimer. He did not dare to quote from the "Fathers" as did they; but Latimer knew his Bible, and a flaming zeal marked his preaching. This brave man has, perhaps, made a more lasting impression on his nation than any other English reformer. Bishop Ryle, himself a fine example of fervor of spirit, tells us that although Baxter was not equal to some of his contemporaries in intellectual gifts, yet few men exercised so great an influence on his generation as did he, because of his fiery zeal. This remark he also applies to Whitefield and Wesley. They were inferior in mental attainments to Bishops Butler and Watson; but they produced effects on the people which fifty Butlers and Watsons would probably never have produced. They saved, he says, the Church of England from ruin, and their zeal was the secret of their power. What a power Christians would be in the world if each one could honestly voice this wish of Brainerd, "Oh, that I was a flaming fire in the hands of my God!" Dr. Mason said that Dr. Chalmers' power lay in his "blood earnestness." New York churches, in pulpit and pen, need this fervent spirit to-day. This alone will melt the iceberg, and burn up the "wood, hay and stubble" in our churches. Would to God that we believed in every drop of the blood the solemn truths of God's Word! Oh, for quenchless love, glowing enthusiasm and fiery zeal! Men are about us on every side who are strangers to God's grace. They are on the road to the judgment seat of Christ and are without God and without hope! While we are not "slothful in business," let us see to it that we are also "fervent in spirit."

Serving the Lord.

The last element in this direction to Christians is "serving the Lord." This latter part of the direction gives unity, beauty, and sanctity to the entire exhortation. Our diligence in duty, and our fervor in spirit, must be governed by a zealous desire to serve Christ. This must be the lofty motive whence all forms of activity proceed. Activity in business is likely to take our affections from God. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that we engage in our so-called secular duties in a religious spirit. Every duty should be begun, continued, and ended with reference to the will of God. We are constantly in danger of separating too widely between what we call secular and sacred things; we too often put asunder what God has joined together. According to this creed, religion is the business of the ministers, and business is the religion of all other men. Religion is very well for sanctuaries and Sabbaths; but it is not suited to the activities of business and the enjoyments of social life. With the locking up of the church, and the laying aside of Sunday garments, the duties of religion are also, too often locked up, and its responsibilities are laid aside. But it is possible to be diligent in duty, and yet to serve God. This motive gives dignity and glory to the humblest child of God; it crowns with unfading honor the labors of every toiler in the Lord's vineyard. The needle of Dorcas wrought for her an inscription, though not in brass or marble, but in thread on garments for the poor, yet one more durable than either brass or marble. Her eulogy will be read when the victories of Roman arms and the glories of Grecian arts are forgotten. The broom of the domestic servant may be as truly used for God as was the sceptre of David or Solomon. You may have the humblest home in social life, and it may yet be more resplendent with the glory of than was the temple in all its grandeur. The hod-carrier's ladder may be trodden by angel's feet, as truly as was the ladder which united heaven and earth in the vision of Jacob, and the hod itself may be radiant with the glory of the Lord. You may be just as much called to your work as the preacher of the Gospel is to his. If you are earnestly engaged in an honorable calling for the glory of God, you as truly serve him in that calling as the most successful preacher of the Word. As students, this thought will give direction to your studies; as business men, it will give inspiration to your pursuits; as wives and mothers, it will give glory to the daily routine of life, and as employes in any capacity, it will make your service as not unto men, but unto Christ.

Let us not think that we must do some great thing, as we call it to honor God; let the little things of life be done with a great motive, and God will be honored. It is just as much the duty of some men to make money, as it is the duty of other men to preach. They ought, therefore, to make money for God; they ought to feel that they do it to serve the Lord Christ. No man in health has a right to give up business; he may have a competency, but the Lord's cause needs and demands all that he can make and bestow. But is it possible for the merchant, the doctor, the lawyer, and the preacher to have distinctly before his mind at every moment, this exalted motive? Perhaps not. I start for Boston, the railway train winds and turns; at some particular moment I seem to be going in the contrary direction, but I know that this is the Boston train, and am sure that it will reach that city. So let a man know, in the very bottom of his soul, that the dominant purpose, the controlling motive of his life is to glorify God, then let him throw himself with the utmost enthusiasm into his work, and he will not fail of glorying God in all his undertakings.

My Bible teaches me that every obligation which rests upon a minister to glorify God, rests equally upon every member of the Church This spirit ought to characterize us in our duties as citizens. Men say, We do not want politics in religion; it is certain, at least, that we need more religion in politics. I do not mean to advocate sectarianism at the polls; but that question has been thrust upon us. The willing tools of an unscrupulous hierarchy are asking our support for men nominated for office in our noble city; our public schools, and other rights, are in danger. Silence in such a case is not golden. Here and now I utter my emphatic protest. The right of suffrage is a great privilege; you ought to exercise it in the spirit of prayer and for the glory of God. You ought to march to the ballot-box with the same religious spirit as when you partake of Holy Communion. This is not to degrade religion, but to apply religion, and to glorify by its presence every duty in life. The religion which does not sweep through, control, and glorify every duty in life, is a religion not worth having. It should manifest its power in the marts of trade as truly as in the sanctuary of God—making better employers and employees, better husbands and wives, better parents and children—thus making earth a foretaste of heaven. Quaintly and truly has it been said:

> In labor's ballad oft more piety
> God finds, than in Te Deum's melody.

Poor, indeed, is that man who lives for this world alone. He forgets that although he may gain the whole world if he loses his soul, he makes an infinitely bad bargain. To-day I urge upon you who are Christians, to make the text of this morning the motto for life; let all your business undertakings be conducted with an eye single to the glory of God. I urge those of you who are not Christians, first to give your hearts in joyful obedience to Christ as your personal Saviour; then live for him whom you have thus made your Prophet, Priest, and King; and you will sweetly realize how blessed it is to be "Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord."

A Missionary in the Cyclone.

Rev J. P Lane of the American Sunday School Union loses House, Home and Property in the recent Oklahoma Cyclone.

WE regret to learn that one of the sufferers from the recent cyclones in the West is Rev. J. P. Lane, a valued missionary of the Sunday School Union. Mr Lane has been very successful in planting schools in the Oklahoma district and in missionary work among the Indians. He recently took up a claim under the Homestead Law and built two houses on the land, one of which he lived in and the other he rented to a physician. They were partially paid for by the slow savings of many years of hard toil and frugality and Mr. Lane hoped to pay the balance by the rent he was to receive from the doctor. On April 25, he went with his family to the nearest town to make some purchases. When they returned a scene awful beyond description met their gaze.

Both houses with all they contained had been swept away by the appalling cyclone which had passed through the territory. A few small articles such as knives, forks and spoons were found on the site, but of the houses and furniture not a vestige. Although thus stripped of all he possessed, Mr. Lane was congratulated by some people in his section whose lot was worse than his own. They were not only financially ruined, but bereaved. Some had lost wives and children, others parents and relatives in the fearful storm. Mr. Lane could but thank God for the providence that took him and his family to the town on that day or he too might have been mourning the loss of some loved one. He is now busily occupied in helping the sufferers, and the saddest part of his duties has been in officiating at the funerals of many whom he knew, some of whom were killed under the ruins of their houses and others have since died of the wounds they received in the storm. All that remains to Mr. Lane now is his claim, and even that he fears he will lose, as the law requires that he live upon it in order to substantiate his title. It is true he may get a tent or construct a dugout, but either will involve much privation and hardship. It is very sad that the calamity has fallen upon one who has given so many years to self-denying labor for the good of other people. He is, however, supported by the consolations he has often administered to the afflicted and sorrowing during the years of his ministrations. Some gifts to enable him to erect some kind of shelter, so that he may not have to forfeit his claim, will, it is hoped, reach him from people who appreciate the value of his past labors.

A LITTLE GOSPEL MAIDEN.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

WE knew a little maiden
Of Gospel nature true,
Fairer than any flower,
Born of the sun and dew;
Such azure eyes! full jeweled,
Of wealth that none can buy;
A face as full of sunbeams
As summer's morning sky.

This little Gospel maiden,
With busy steps each day,
Strews love-light gems that exile
The shadows far away.
She often is seen hastening,
Ere day has just begun;
Her hands both filled with blossoms,
To cheer some prostrate one.

Toilers account her blessed;
The humble poor in need,
To whom in dwellings lowly
Her tireless footsteps lead,
Tales sweet of her come singing—
Tales joyous to recite;
Of cares and shadows lifted,
And heavy hearts made light.

Thus day by day she scatters
The shadows, every one;
Her love-light deeds surpassing
The brightness of the sun.
Oh, blessed little maiden,
With but this "Christ-kind" thought,
How she may lift the shadows
With which our paths are fraught.

This world has gems exhaustless,
And glorious works of art—
Can they, like gems of love-light,
Lift shadows from the heart?—L.S.D.

KEEP THOU ME.

NEARER to Thee would I come,
Nearer to Thee.
Close to Thy wounded side
Keep Thou me.

From the heart's temptations and sins,
From the promptings to evil within,
From earth's allurements and din
Keep Thou me.

Then shall I safely glide
O'er life's rough sea,
Peace and a haven find
If kept by Thee.

Sowing Gospel Seed.

"The Christian Herald" Sunday School Missionary tells of his Work in Missouri—A whole Community Converted.

SINCE my letter in March I have traveled in four counties. One point visited was reached by a few hours' ride on a freight train. As it made long stops at small stations, where the people assembled, I availed myself of the opportunities of distributing Sunday School and religious papers, and tracts to the people at the depots, as well as on the train, and of conversing with a number of people on religious topics, which in every case seemed to be well received. One sceptic, however, proved to be a desperately wicked man. I had a lengthy interview with him and warned him faithfully of the spiritual danger of such infidelity.

The next day I visited three Sunday Schools in a town, preached twice and distributed tracts. It was a joyful sight after preaching, to see so many come forward. There were many proofs of God's blessings upon the services, and the tour enabled me to encourage Sunday School work and spread the Gospel. I also visited a Presbyterian meeting and preached a sermon previous to the ordination (by that body) of two young men to the Gospel ministry. The text was Jude 3. At the same place I conducted a devotional exercise for the Woman's Missionary Society, representatives of which had assembled there, and distributed among the Sunday Schools and others a large number of helpful Gospel books and tracts, at the same time addressing the laborers on methods of promoting Sunday Schools and missionary work.

In a third tour (in another county), I visited a country school house where I had organized a school a few years ago. The farmer at whose house I had lodged at that time has since been converted with several of his family, and many more in the neighborhood, which is now transformed from a state of carelessness and wickedness into a pious community. At my recent visit the blessing of God was very manifest. The school goes forward with increasing interest. Those who have confessed their faith in Christ have proved the genuineness of their conversion by their changed lives, and their zealous and godly conversation. I encouraged them to erect a house of worship, and think it will be built soon.

My fourth tour was in another county where the people heard the preaching and Sunday School talks gladly. At one place, which I visited about six months ago, the Sunday School has been allowed to close in the severe cold weather; but it has been revived with encouraging prospects, and with earnestness on the part of the workers. They had been without preaching since I was there six months ago.

I ask earnest prayer that I may have all grace necessary for the work, and bodily strength for it. I am now traveling in the country district. GEO. W. SHARP.

A RELIGION WITHOUT A GOD.

THERE is much agnosticism among the educated classes of the Siamese, writes Rev. J. A. Eakin of Bangkok, in The Church at Home and Abroad, especially among the younger men. In a conversation with the Prince the brother of the king of Siam—he spoke of the orthodox doctrine of the way to order one's life in this world so that he would reach Nirvana at last. When he was asked whether it would not be better to teach that there is a Divine Father, and that when men die they may attain to eternal happiness in the future life, he looked thoughtful for a moment, and then said: "Yes, that is better. For the common people it is." He insisted that the mass of the people held a religious belief that was essentially different from the teachings of Buddha on several important points. They worshipped spirits and prayed to a god, both of which were contrary to the precepts of Buddhism. They looked forward to a reward of merit or a punishment of demerit after this life is ended, instead of fixing their hopes upon the dreamless repose of Nirvana. He said: "When I was a child, I was taught to pray to the god; but when I grew up and entered the priesthood, I found that the teachings of the priests were very different from what my mother had taught me."

The priest delights in abstractions, and teaches his pupil that there is no help for him except in himself. By his own efforts he must control his evil nature and prepare for that state in which joy and sorrow, hope and despair, love and hatred will be ended; nay, even thought will cease, and only existence will remain, in a sleep that knows no waking. It is a religion without a god.

THE FOURTH AND FIFTH SEALS.

The Concluding Events of this Dispensation as Portrayed under the Figure of the Seals.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.*

"AND when he opened the fourth seal I heard the voice of the Fourth Living One say, Go! And I saw and behold a livid horse; and he that sat upon him was Death; and Hades followed with him; and there was given them authority upon the fourth part of the earth, to kill with the sword, and with famine, and with pestilence, and by the wild beasts of the earth." Again the voice of command is heard, "Go!" It comes from the midst of the throne. It is the voice of the fourth of these Living Ones. He who rides forth now is the angel of death, the Destroying Angel, as the executioner of the sentence that issues from this dread page of that book: "to slay,to kill." But this word "kill" is not in reality the same as in verse 4. Here it conveys the sentence of a judge and the act of a legalized minister of justice.

He rides forth, this angel, in the wake of those destructive agencies that have gone before through those fields of wasting misery, with instruction and authority to reap the harvest down; and Hades—impersonating the insatiable gulf of the dead—follows to receive and store the slain. They may kill with "the sword, and famine, and pestilence." These have been already at work; but to them a fresh weapon is now given, "the wild beasts of the earth." War and strife have brought famine; and famine has brought pestilence, and in the lands so desolated, wild and ferocious beasts will make their lair, and find their almost unresisting prey. Yet there is a limit to the power of these two executioners. How long is not defined, but how far is. The fourth part of the earth is given up to them; and the land of Israel is not exempted. For this is no doubt the same visitation of judgment; and the religious condtion of Israel, during the time of their covenant with the Man of Sin, the same as we find in that prediction of Ezekiel14:12-23.

We have it also foretold in connection with the mission of the two Witnesses, who, while these judgments are going forth from this book, "have power to smite the land with all plagues as often as they will;" to shut the heaven that it rain not as Elias did, and so to produce or deepen this famine to turn the waters into blood; to bring down fire from heaven (Rev. 9: 5, 6); and, as Elisha did against the scoffing sons of Bethel, so, too, may they call in the wild beasts to remove the blasphemers (II. Kings 2: 23, 24)

"And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw underneath the Altar the souls of them that had been slain in the cause of the Word of God and for that testimony which they held fast; and they cried with a great voice, saying: Until when, O Thou Master, the Holy and True, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that are dwelling on the earth."

Who are these martyrs? Not the martyrs of the past ages, for these already have their crowns, and are with Christ in the risen glory. But they are the martyrs of this judgment-time, who had heard God's true Gospel from the burning lips of the two Witnesses; who had mourned in deep penitence for their own transgression; who had looked, like Thomas, with the eye of faith, on Christ! and had in this sifting time held fast the Word of God in the face of the prevailing apostasy.

And what is their cry? It is loud and claimant for avenging justice. Murdered, expelled from the earth, their blood crying to heaven they appeal to the Son of David and the Son of God for avenging justice on the Man and his Antichristian hosts, who are now invading, oppressing, and slaughtering the faithful. "Lord, until when?" And to whom is their cry? To him who is there grasping in his hand that Seven-sealed Roll, in command and power; the Lord, the Master. They do not address him as the Jesus, as the Lamb slain, but as the Master.

To their cry there is an immediate response. "And it was said to them that they should wait yet for a short time;" not rest, the word does not mean that; but wait, cease, suspend their cry for avenging justice. It is near; but the hour is not yet struck. The tribulation in [illegible] in it yet more impious; and there are faithful men—"fellow servants of theirs and brethren—left in it, who are yet to pass through the baptism of blood. Their names are in the Book of the Lamb. When their number is full, and they, too, clothed in "White Robes;" then will they all, if not permitted to take part with him in that last act of avenging doom, look [illegible]

THE IDEAL OF CHARACTER.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 28. Prov. 31: 20-31; II Timothy 2: 15.

PROTESTANTISM has often been reproached with laying more stress on creed than on character. Unhappily there has been ground for the reproach. It was the inevitable reaction from the system which had degenerated into formalism and the observance of empty rites and ceremonies. In insisting on the heart being right and on the futility of outward conformity while there was no inward change,an impression was produced on unthinking persons that so long as their creed was orthodox, they might live as they chose. A new reaction has now set in and we are again in danger of being indifferent to creed, when the conduct is right. It seems impossible to obtain a general and popular adherance to the true order of a righteous and beneficent life springing from sound principles and strong faith. Yet it should not be difficult for a Protestant people, who take the Bible as their guide. The Bible is as clear about the necessity of inward grace as of righteousness of life. It insists on a good life as emphatically as if men were to be saved by their works; and on faith as emphatically as if faith alone were required. It is only when we perceive that the faith demanded—the only faith which saves—is a faith that produces a beneficent life, that we obtain the clue to the mystery. In the sketch contained in the passage selected for the topic, we have a character which is the natural expression and embodiment of inward grace. The duties to the family, the household,and the poor and needy are fulfilled with intelligence and energy. So much is required of every one and the Christian has no immunity from the obligatton. Rather, there is an additional obligation in the fact of the necessity of letting his light shine before men. If religion were merely a device for enabling a man or woman to escape the penalties of wrongdoing in this life, it would be a curse to the world rather than a blessing. It is intended to make men better, to make their lives in this world better, purer, stronger and more beneficent than they would be without it. There is no duty in the house,the family, or the world, that can be escaped by becoming a Christian. The persons with whom we come in contact ought to be more secure of our doing our duty to them when we become Christians, than they are when they depend on our kindliness or honesty. The Christian ought to be a better son,a better husband and father, a better neighbor and employer and a better citizen because of his being a Christian. He has a higher motive and he is under a higher obligation than he has who is not a Christian. The world knows this, even if he does not realize it himself. The very head lines in our newspapers emphasize the fact. If a wrong is done, and the wrongdoer has made a profession of religion, the fact is blazoned as an additional reproach, an evidence of darker turpitude, the man being one of whom better things were expected. It is not that the Christian doing his duty entitles him to future glory as a reward, but that he who is fit for future glory must possess the qualities which ensure his doing his duty here. And the converse is true; for he who wilfully and habitually neglects his duty, gives ground for the suspicion that he is without the grace of God which sanctifies and purifies the life.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Holston (Tenn.), Conference District Epworth League held a Spring rally on April 20, in the First Church, Knoxville. Fully four hundred delegates were in attendance, and about three hundred attended the sunrise prayer meeting, at 5:30 A. M. As an indication of the progress of the movement in the district, it was noted that sixty Leagues reported at this rally, while at the one in October, there were only twenty-four. The increase in membership was about a thousand. Rev. E. S. Lewis, D. D., pastor of Trinity Church, Cincinnati, took the place of Dr. Schell, the General Secretary, who was prevented by sickness from attending the rally. Dr. Lewis conducted the Question Box, and gave an address on "How to Conduct the Devotional Meeting."—Newburg District held its third annual convention at Middletown, N. Y. The meetings were large and enthusiastic. The officers elected for the year were Rev.O. H. Merchant, President; Corresponding Secretary, Rev. DeWitt B. Thompson; Recoiding Secretary, Miss I. M. Benton; Treasurer, Miss Lizzie Thompson.—One of the most successful District Conventions of the year was that held on May 4 and 5, in the Nostraud Avenue Church, Brooklyn. It was the Second General Conference District Convention, which comprises thirty presiding elders' districts. Beside the six delegates from each district there was a large attendance from local Leagues of the city and neighborhood.—At least ten thousand delegates are expected to be at Cleveland, O., on June 29, to attend the great national convention. This will be an average of one delegate from each chapter. Probably all the Chapters will not be represented, but the deficiencies of the more distant Chapters will be more than balanced by those near the city.

HE WENT ABOUT DOING GOOD

MR. HENRY W. EASTMAN, one of the founders and manager of the Friendly Inn, Baltimore, Md , whose admirable work was described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few weeks ago, died on Sunday, April 30th. Mr. Eastman was a man of heart and purpose, and went constantly "about doing good." He was a philanthropist who tried to build up both the souls and bodies of men and especially aimed to help men to help themselves. He was peculiarly fitted for the position he held, and brought to the Master's service rare qualities for the special work. Under his skilful management, the buildings of the Friendly Inn multiplied, its field of benevolence was widened, and it became a blessing to those who most needed help. Mr. Eastman was an untiring worker for the upbuilding of this practical charity. He was greatly loved and will be missed by hundreds to whom his kindly presence was an inspiration and a blessing. The Friendly Inn Building has recently been renewed and rebuilt, and will continue to carry on the good work which Mr. Eastman, together with his associates, Mr. Daniel Miller, Dr. Chisholm and Mr. D. W. Glass, founded and established in the spirit of Christian helpfulness.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF NEW YORK STATE

THE April issue of "State Notes of Young Men's Christian Associations of New York," contains facts and figures of the growth of this work in New York State during the past year. We note that there are 150 associations in the State, with 113 General Secretaries and 68 assistants; also 33 Physical Directors, who have in charge the Physical Department of Association work. This feature marks a wonderful growth in that so many men are giving their entire time as Secretaries to this department of Christian work. There are 45 buildings owned by the Association, with a valuation of $3,004,250. 141 of the 150 associations have an aggregate membership of 38,044,with 10,918 active members. There are 27 associations among railroad men, 18 in the colleges of the State, 4 among German, and 1 for French-speaking young men. There is an organized work for boys in 58 of the Associations, having their own religious meetings and Bible classes. Although the work of the Association is so largely preventive in its nature, over 1,200 professed conversions are given.

An interesting report of the Saratoga Convention held in February last is also contained in this number. Addresses upon different forms of Association work by prominent clergymen and Association men are included with the practical discussions and papers contained in the very full programme.

The "State Notes" including this report can be had by application to the State Executive Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, No. 40 East 23rd Street, New York City.

THE INTERNATIONAL Y. W. C. A. CONVENTION

A MOST enthusiastic gathering was that which assembled at Toledo, O., April 27-30 for the International Convention of Young Women's Christian Associations. Two hundred and seventeen young women were present as delegates from Associations in Canada and fifteen States of the Union. An invitation was presented from the Associations in Great Britain to unite with them in forming a World's Young Women's Christian Association. After some discussion this was accepted. The report of the International Committee showed that new Associations had organized since last session in 1891,in Lowell, Harlem,Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Detroit, Pittsburg, Leland Stanford, Jr. University, Chicago University, Northfield Seminary and many other prominent cities and colleges. Several interesting addresses were delivered by eminent persons. Dr. Thomas C. Hall, Chicago, spoke on "Neglected Rights Worth Contending for;" Mr. L. D. Wishard, New York City, presented the claims of Young Women of the Orient; Prof. W. W. White of Xenia Theological Seminary conducted Bible lessons from Philippians. Leading Association members presented papers on the business, social, physical, intellectual and spiritual departments.

A ROYAL SILVER WEDDING.

Humbert and Margherita and their Simple Domestic Life—A Peep into a Palace.

GALA days indeed for the sons and daughters of "Sunny Italy" were those during which, a few weeks ago, the "Silver Wedding" of King Humbert and Queen Margherita was celebrated throughout the kingdom. Of course there were the usual fetes, fireworks and banquets and the inevitable state balls, at which fashion in all the pride and pomp of officialism displayed itself to the multitude. But the quiet celebration in the royal palace itself was not for the common gaze.

There is quite a pleasant story current in the Italian Court, concerning the early acquaintance of Humbert and the Princess Margherita, which illustrates the truth that, as a rule, affection is not a considerable factor in royal marriages. However, it is undeniable that in the case of these two, the arrangement turned out to be a fortunate one. In 1868 Prince Humbert was twenty-four years old, and his father wished to find him a wife. The wife destined for him — an Austrian Archduchess — had died. One day Victor Emmanuel told his Prime Minister, General Menabrea, that he must absolutely find a spouse for the Prince. To this peremptory command the soldier quietly remarked that she was already found, and he mentioned the Princess Margherita, the beautiful daughter of the Duke of Genoa and niece of the King. Victor Emmanuel was at first surprised, but resolved to make inquiries into the Princess's character, and to pay her an unexpected visit. He set out for Turin, and was charmed with all he saw. The marriage was in due course arranged, and on April 21, 1868, was celebrated with great pomp at Turin.

On the death of old King Victor Emmanuel, Prince Humbert ascended the throne, but his new responsibilities made no change in the happiness of his domestic life. Many are the anecdotes which are related in illustration of the manner in which he and the simple Queen live. The King, in contrast to the Queen, is quite inartistic in his tastes, and, above all, has no ear for music. The Queen, some years back, found it needful to wear spectacles in order to read. These glasses annoyed the King, who, when he saw them going up, would say at once, "Margherita, put down those glasses." She did not obey. "Margherita, if you don't take off those glasses I shall sing," and she has such a dread of his false notes that she obeyed at once to save herself from that torment.

Queen Margherita is as accomplished as she is beautiful. She speaks a number of foreign languages, and with German and French literature she has quite an extensive acquaintance.

A writer who has enjoyed the privilege of a personal acquaintance with the Queen for many years, thus speaks of her girlhood: "At sixteen she was a slender and remarkably graceful girl, somewhat above the average height of women, with brilliant, fair complexion, glossy golden hair, and large, bright blue eyes. To me she appeared to be one of the most amiable, cheerful and vivacious girls I had ever seen. From Piedmontese dames, who had one time or another been in waiting upon her mother and herself, I learned that she was an adept in every kind of needlework, useful and ornamental, a skilled executant upon the pianoforte and zither, an agreeable singer of lieder and stornelli, and an able artist.

AN ITALIAN SILVER WEDDING—KING HUMBERT AND QUEEN MARGHERITA.

Apropos of needlework, in which 'Madame Marguerite's' interest has been steadfastly maintained during the past quarter of a century, I may here reproduce a true story related to me on her wedding-eve by one of the ladies above referred to, in illustration of the Princess's goodness of heart and earnest patriotism. As soon as the date of her marriage day was fixed, early in February, 1868, preparations for the trousseau were at once commenced, and it was proposed to order the dresses, laces, linen—in fact all the articles of which a royal bride's countless toilettes are composed—direct from Paris. On hearing of this project the Princess at once insisted that the making of every article of dress required for nuptial equipment should be confided to the local charitable institutions, schools and refuges, of which she was an indefatigable and generous patroness. She was told that the things would be badly made, and replied that if she was satisfied with them no one else need be discontented. 'But there will be no time for their completion.' 'If not, let those articles which cannot be got ready by my little people be ordered from abroad, if you like; but by Turin tradesfolk, so that my fellow-countrymen may derive whatever benefit be attainable by them from my marriage.' Her commands were literally obeyed."

The noble behavior of King Humbert, the Re Cavaliere sco ("Cavalier King"), during the last great cholera epidemic in Southern Italy, when he braved death, week after week, by house-to-house visiting among the victims of that deadly malady, is still fresh in the public memory, as well as his touching kindness to the sorrow-stricken mother of his would-be assassin, Passanante. This is certain: that a more chivalric soldier, devoted patriot, and high-souled man than Humbert, has rarely worn a diadem of European sovereignty.

Indian Baby-brides.

IN an article written by Soonderai B. Power, on infant marriage in India, the writer says: "The day a girl is born, her people begin to speak of her marriage, and are in search of a husband; and if they come across a small baby boy, at once they promise his parents that they will be glad to give their daughter to their son. As soon as they agree with each other, the father of the son sends some jewels to the girl.

Then they have pleasant dinner parties, and both families send sweetmeats to their relatives and friends. From that time these children are engaged. The girl must be a wife before she is ten years old. Sometimes the children are married in their cradles. The expensive jewels and dresses the children cannot wear, so they decorate the cradles with them. Higher classes of people have to give a dowry to their daughters. Among the lower classes they sell their children as we do animals.

'When an offer is made for a girl, the buyer will say to the father of the girl, 'If you will give your daughter to my son, I shall give you two hundred rupees for her.' Then her father says,

"'Our daughter is very pretty and active. We will take at least five hundred rupees for her.' Then the other replies, 'Very well; take three hundred rupees.' In this way they bargain.

"In the Marwadi caste, the girl is not married soon, because one thousand rupees are required if the girl is one year older. If a girl is ten years old, her parents get ten thousand; if she is fourteen years old, her parents get fourteen thousand, and so on. Poor girls of India, they are to be pitied."

SOUL HOUSES.

FROM cellar unto attic, all is clean
Nothing there is that need evade the eye:
All the dark places by the world unseen,
Are as well ordered as what open lie.

From winter's revelry and summer's ease,
Souls seem to get as foul as houses do;
Each spring, each autumn, revolution sees;
And they are "swept and garnished all anew."

Spirit, how is it with those rooms of thine?
What front the world look very clean and fair;
Thy curtains are so white, thy windows shine.
Are dirt and cobwebs hiding anywhere?

Ah! souls are houses; and to keep them well,
Nor, spring and autumn, mourn their wretched plight,
To daily toil must vigilance compel,
Right underneath God's scrutinizing light.

THE OLD ROCKER

YOU see the edge of that rocker, worn quite deep? That is where her foot was placed while she sat with her knitting or sewing, on summer afternoons, while the bees hummed at the door and the shout of the boy at the oxen was heard afield. From the way the rocker is worn, I think that sometimes the foot must have been very tired and the ankle very sore; but I do not think she stopped for that. When such a cradle as that got a-going, it kept on for years.

Scarlet-fever came in the door, and we all had it; and oh how the cradle did go! We contended as to who should lie in it, for sickness, you know, makes babies of us all. But after a while we surrendered it to Charlie. He was too old to lie in it, but he seemed so very, very sick; and with him in the cradle it was "Rock!" "Rock!" "Rock!" But one day, just as long ago as you can remember, the cradle stopped. When a child is asleep, there is no need of rocking. Charlie was asleep. He was sound asleep. Nothing would wake him. He needed taking up. Mother was too weak to do it.

The neighbors came in to do that, and put a flower, fresh out of the garden-dew, between the two still hands. The fever had gone out of the cheek, and left it white, very white—the rose exchanged for the lily. There was one less to contend for the cradle. It soon started again, and with a voice not quite so firm as before, but more tender, the old song came back: "Bye! bye! bye!" which meant more to you than "Il Trovatore," rendered by an opera troupe in the presence of an American audience, all leaning forward and nodding, to show how well they understood Italian.

Teasing.

LET sisters not begrudge the time and care bestowed on a brother. It is hard to believe that any boy you know so well as your brother can ever turn out anything very useful. Well, he may not be a Moses. There is only one of that kind needed for six thousand years. But I tell you what your brother will be—either a blessing or a curse to society, and a candidate for happiness or wretchedness. He will, like Moses, have the choice between rubies and living coals, and your influence will have much to do with his decision. He may not, like Moses, be the deliverer of a nation, but he may, after your father and mother are gone, be the deliverer of a household.

THE STORY OF AN OLD BIBLE

By J. JACKSON WRAY and WM. H. WITHROW.

CHAPTER X.

ON THE BATTLE FIELD.

OUR loyal immigrants were anxious to take up land at once, as their wont was by the tilling of the soil. But the disturbed condition of the country forbade this, made it, indeed, almost impossible. It was like enough that these seekers after rest and quiet were again to be disturbed by the ravages of war.

So the Governor of Montreal, who had received them with such favor and showed them such kindness, dissuaded them from settling down for the present on any grant of land; and he offered the men constant work and liberal wages in strengthening the defences of the town. In a little while the united families were comfortably bestowed in a large and disused storehouse not far from the Government quarters. Here they had a roomy and comfortable home of their own, but even then they did not unlink themselves from Jean Baptiste and his wife Marie.

Scarcely had our little party of adventurers got themselves happily and comfortably housed in their new home in the empty store rooms of the Government premises, and in immediate contiguity to the barracks, than they were once more committed to a season of agitation and unrest. The Governor-General of Canada, Sir Guy Carleton, resolved to recapture, if possible, the two strong forts of Crown Point and Ticonderoga, which had been seized by the insurgent colonists across the border.

He called upon the land-owners of the province, and their tenantry, to provide militiamen for the purposes of war, according to the terms on which they held the soil from the British Crown. Many of the "seigneurs," as the proprietors were called, responded to the call, but the tenants, who had not forgotten the hardships of the last war, denied their liability to further military service, and severely stopped at home. The Governor who had only about eight hundred regular soldiers under his command for the protection of the province, issued a proclamation, declaring the country under martial law, and calling out the militia in imperious terms. But the more he called, the more they would not come. The mandate of Bishop De Briand, the French Metropolitan of the diocese was added to this, but without avail.

As soon as this fact was discovered by the American Colonists, they began to invade Canada, in the firm belief that its people sympathized with the Republic, and would join in the general revolt, and were only waiting for the coming of an armed force to join in the Revolution, which was to establish a new American nation in the land from Hudson's Bay to the Mississippi. This decision was instantly followed by the advance of an army of over a thousand men, under General Schuyler. Crossing the river St. Lawrence by night, a force of over three hundred men sought to take Montreal by surprise. In the dim dawn of a September morning, Brave Barbara Heck was aroused by a great commotion in the barrack-[illegible], and yet the shrill blare of the bugle rent the air, and the rapid roll and throb of drum beat up the men to arms. The soldiers rushed from their quarters to take their places in their companies, buckling on their belts and adjusting their accoutrements as they ran. Ball cartridges were served out in hot haste, and the brave fellows filed out through the narrow streets to the western gate.

Brave Barbara, followed by her husband and her ever-present comrades, felt that she was wanted, or would be, when the deadly onset should arrive, hastened after them, and soon discovered that her instincts had led her right. The soldiers were only two hundred and eighty men, all told. They found themselves face to face with a superior force, and the hurly-burly began. The Americans had taken up their position behind some farmhouses barns, etc., just outside the walls; and soon the crack of guns, the shouts of contending foes, and the groans of the wounded, were heard upon the morning air!

After a sharp and desperate struggle the decimated forces recrossed the river, but not until they had left both dead and dying on the fiercely-fought field. The defenders, though not so severely handled, had to mourn considerable loss, mainly in sorely-wounded men, and among these latter were Colonel Featherstone, the officer in command, and Major Wilson, a militia officer, who was also a leading merchant of the city, and a man of great influence.

These were tended, nursed, and cared for by Barbara and Mary Embury, to whom it was owing, under God, that they did not perish as the result of the short, but fearful fray. With her own hands the brave and ever-ready Barbara had fetched some bundles of straw from a neighboring barn. A rude couch was formed of these, and the two wounded men were carried by Paul Heck, John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan, and placed in the kindly and gentle care of the two women, who were "ministering angels, good at need," and whose precious help in that testing hour was never forgotten by the wounded warriors whom they kept in life.

No sooner were their patients cared for, and placed in the ward of the barrack-surgeons than our volunteer nurses busied themselves among the wounded soldiers; and many a hearty "God bless you!" made music in their ears from the lips of the brave fellows whose pains they soothed, and whose path they smoothed towards the "bourne from which no traveler returns."

Amongst the rest of the sufferers who had "chanced upon that evil hour" was Ned Stennit, who had spoken so strongly about "them Methody Swaddlers" and their abominable doings in Flanders. Ned was lying in the rude impromptu hospital which had been set up in a farmer's barn; and as he lay, sore wounded and helpless on the heap of straw which did duty for a bed, he found occasion to modify his opinion on that subject. Barbara Heck and her friend, Mary Embury, those two true "sisters of mercy," had tended him so kindly, had visited him so constantly, and had done so much to relieve and comfort him, that he made haste to unburden his conscience concerning them.

It so happened that our quaint friend and favorite, Lucky Mike, was put in charge of the prostrate Ned, and of half-a-dozen other wounded men, Geoffrey Higgs, the officer's man who refused to obey Ned's orders about Barbara, among the rest.

"Mike Finnigan's my name, comrades," he had said, when he was put in charge, "or, rather Lucky Mike, if you plase, an' all the luckier if 'I can do the laist bit in the world to make yo' a saft spot on the straw, or whatever a willin' hand can do to make ye aisy, now. Sure an ye ye've only got to give yer orders, lads, an' Lucky Mike, that stands fornenst ye is yer humble sarvint."

As he spoke, he ran his fingers through his towsled hair; it would not submit to treatment; his face and eyes were lighted up with a peculiar blend of sympathy and humor, and the "lads" took to him at once.

"Orders, is it?" said one of them, "then in the devil's name give us a drink o' water, Pat!"

All the poor, thirsty sufferers followed suit and the call for water was heard on every side.

"Look here, me bhoys!" said Mike, quietly, taking no notice of the somewhat contemptuous "Pat," which would once have electrified every hair of his red head, and have produced a response more pat than pleasant—"you shall hav' the wather at wance, an' the best that's on the brew; but not in the name av the divil, av ye plase. Sure, and I'll hev' nothing to do with the ould, black-hearted haythen. In the name of the blessed Lord Jesus, ye shall have it." Leaving the barn, he made haste to fetch the coveted supply.

"He's another o' them Methodies," said Geoffrey Higgs to Ned Stennit, who lay near: "they can't be such a bad set after all."

"I've had nowt to say of 'em besides black words an' hard curses; but if the Swaddlers are much o' the same kidney as them two women and this kind hearted brick of an Irishman, all I've got to say is, the Swaddlers may swaddle for all me; and I'm not sure that a bit o' Methody mixture, whatever it is, mightn't be good medicine for me."

By this time Mike had returned with the "cup of cold water" which in his Master's name, he had brought for each of those over whom he had watch and ward. In each case Mike kept the refreshing beverage in his own hands; lifting it to the parched lips of the applicants, so that they should not overpass the doctor's regulations; and passing round and round again, so that the poor fellows might have enough. A general expression of content rewarded him, and he smilingly advised his patients to compose themselves to sleep. "Sleep! not much!" said one. "It 'll be time enough for that at sun-down."

"I say, Mike," cried Ned Stennit. "You might sing us a song, old fellow. Give us 'The Green Hills of Killarney,' or 'The Limerick Bells.'"

"I'll sing to ye," said Mike with a laugh, thinking to himself as he spoke, that he was Lucky Mike once again, and straightway he sung, and sung well, for Mike had a remarkable faculty in this direction, an old and favorite ditty which was familiar to them all. He was pressed, as he was expecting to be, to sing them yet another, and readily consented.

"With the greatest pleasure in life," said Mike. "The wan that I sung for ye just now, was an ould wan, now you shall have a new wan, as purty a beauty, sure, as was ever set to music. The music's good, but the words are better, swater an' more—but there," said he, as if giving up the effort at description in despair, you shall hear for yourselves. I only wish the Mistress were to the fore, for it's her that can——"

"Who's the Misthress, as you call her?" said Ned.

"Cushla ma chree!" said Mike, speaking with an earnestness and energy that showed his whole soul to be in the expression, an expression which, being tamely translated into English, means "The vein of my heart," and which did not inaptly describe the depth of his devotion. "Cushla ma chree!" said Mike a second time, "that's who the Mistress is, God bless her! an' it's her that could char-r-m the sowls o' ye wi' the new song that I towld ye av."

While these and kindred sentences were being interchanged, who should make her appearance on the scene but brave Barbara, who, accompanied by John Lawrence, had brought the wounded soldiers an appetising dish of nourishing food suited to their invalided condition; and Ned Stennit and Geoffrey Higgs, as spokesmen for the rest, were quick to voice their thanks in rough and vigorous, but genuine language of the heart.

"It's just a mother you are to the lot of us," said Ned, with real feeling. "You wont mind what I said consarnin' the Methodies, will you, ma'am? 'Twas the jabber of a misbe-knowin' fool, an'—

"There, that's enongh, and more than enough," said Barbara, laying her hand gently on his brow. You are not to get excited; and you didn't know the truth. The Methodies, as you call us, are only simple, honest folk who love the Lord Jesus, and dearly want to get other folks to do the same. "Listen, lads," she said, looking round upon the wounded men, "I'm going to sing a new song. You're fond of singing; all soldiers are. Its just a song for tired and wounded ones like you."

As Barbara's sweet, clear voice gave forth the strains of "Jesus, Lover of My Soul!" her audience of wounded soldiers were hushed into an awed, yet rapt and wistful silence. Even those whose pains were wont to extort a half-suppressed groan or a muttered curse, seemed to find, in the sweet chords, an anodyne that made them forget. Needless to say, the "Sister of Mercy," winsome messenger of Jesus, put all her soul into her singing, and when she came to the words,

> Other refuge have I none,
> Hangs my helpless soul on Thee, it seemed as though a mute confession sat upon the face of every pallid listener, and as if the very air was like enough to vibrate of itself with the strength of their conscious need. By-and-by the singer sounded the exultant and trustful note, "Thou, O Christ, art all I want." One of the poor fellows, a young soldier who had been fearfully wounded and had borne his sufferings with heroic patience, raised himself on end, despite the pain it cost him. He fixed his eyes upon the singer, smiled his thanks with such intensity of meaning that Barbara had much ado to master the choking in her throat, and, lifting his hand, he said, "All I want," and fell upon his bed of straw.

The rest of the song remained unsung. Barbara, in another moment, was kneeling by his side, while John Lawrence hastened off in search of the barrack-surgeon. It was evident, however, that the end had nearly come. The young soldier had swooned away, and came to himself again while Barbara, on her knees, was pouring out her soul to God in prayer. Again the soldier, evidently dying, smiled upon her, looked up and whispered, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." The doctor came; the soldier shook his head, and said, as he lifted his eyes once again, "All I want." With his hand laid within the palm of the tearful and sympathetic Barbara, he passed away, the smile upon his face still bearing witness of the "plenteous grace" he had found as he sank to rest.

The effect upon the soldiers was so great that it caused a silence deep and profound, a "powerful silence," as it was well called by Mike Finnigan. It was broken by Barbara, who spoke of the soldier's happy departure to be with Christ, and of their equal share in the Lover of souls. Then she sang the final stanza of the immortal hymn amid the lingering strains of which Private Rodwell had soared to heaven; and every listener caught the glorious message and felt its power as she voiced the glorious proclamation, "Plenteous grace in Christ is found."

The outcome of the startling episode in the early days of Brave Barbara's career in Canada, was a revival of religion in the barracks themselves; and in the city, too, for the spacious bakery-room of Jean Baptiste Lafarge was placed at the disposal of our religious reformers. Paul Heck, John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan, aided by Mary Lawrence, and, shall I say, led by Brave Barbara, held evangelistic services and thus planted a vital and immortal tree of life in the heart of the city, which until now had been mainly under the domination of "La Vierge," and the superstitions which had gathered round her name.

I cannot find space to dwell on this most interesting chapter in Barbara's history. It must suffice to say that her new and right worthy friend, Marie Lafarge, became also her comrade in Christian pilgrimage and active religious labor, and the simple way in which Marie told the story of how she transferred her trust from "La Vierge" to Jesus, her Saviour, told as it was in her broken English, had no small share in trimming and brightening the Gospel lamp that shines so luminously in Montreal to-day.

Among those who were, at any rate, partially drawn within the Methodist net, was none other than the keen old soldier, Major Featherstone, who had tried to induce John Lawrence to enlist in the service of George the Third. The remarkable skill and gentle kindness with which Barbara had ministered to his needs as a nurse in his wounded condition, had led him to weigh her whole character and her Methodism in balances free from prejudice. He had seen service in Flanders, where the Methodist movement was strongly represented, and he was compelled to acknowledge that the Methodist soldiery who had been under his command were men, than whom none were braver and few were relied on better or trusted more.

Major Featherstone found a real satisfaction, and in truth much profit, in the long conversation he had with his volunteer nurse; and it may well be believed that the ready Barbara lost no opportunity of preaching to him in one form or another, mainly in a seemingly unconscious way, the Gospel of her Lord and Master.

On one occasion Paul and his heroic wife happened to be in conversation when the Major entered with the news that the two forts of Chambly and St. John were in danger of siege from the forces of the revolted colonies: and that volunteers were being enrolled to defend the forts and repulse the invaders.

"I say, Heck," said the Major, "why don't you, together with that fine fellow Lawrence, take service for the king? With your steady habits and superior ability, you would be sure of promotion when the campaign's over."

"Service for the king!" said Paul, all alive with fervor in a moment; "I already serve the Best of Kings, and to be a good soldier of Jesus Christ is just the best and biggest ambition of my life. As for king George, I am quite willing to suffer, if need be. But fight for him, or for anybody else, I cannot. They that use the sword shall perish by the sword; and my Master says, 'Vengeance is Mine.'"

"You are an unpracticable sort of fellow, Heck," said the Major. "If all men were of your belief, our business would soon be at an end. However would this queer world wag if all men were of your way of thinking?"

"I expect the widows and orphans of his Majesty's slain soldiers, and the thousands of unhappy families who are ruined and stricken by the accursed business, and the multitudes who really believe in the brotherhood of man, would wag on more merrily and cheerily if wars should cease unto the ends of the earth. The Bible says that the day is coming when the nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and they shall not learn war any more. And my business, and every Christian's business, is to help on that glorious day!"

SAVED BY A MOTHER'S PRAYERS.

IN a distant city, in a saloon of the lowest type, a man was shot and fatally injured during a drunken brawl. It caused no great commotion, as it was a common occurrence. He was taken to the hospital where he lay on the snow-white cot unconscious; but kind, pitying faces bending over him, seemed to warm him to life again, and bring the wandering mind back, somewhat. As he lay thus, a picture floated before him—a picture of a room, humble, though as neat and tidy as the untiring mother-hands could make it; before the broad old-fashioned fireplace sat a figure that in days gone by had been as dear to him as life itself. The face was one of those sweet, patient ones that seem to express nothing but love and kindness, and as he gazed on it, he heard a voice, as sweet and low as the sighing of the summer breeze. Hark! you can catch the words:

Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed;

The little form in her arms nestles closer as the song goes on:

Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.

As the last soft notes died away the little tot slipped out of her arms and knelt at her knee, and the childish voice lisped a prayer. She lifted her wee darling in her strong, loving arms and printing a mother's good-night kiss on the round cheek, she placed him in his tiny bed.

For a moment all was dark, then again he saw that little room; he could hear the soft breathing of the wee sleeper, and kneeling by the little bed, with her hands uplifted and her eyes suffused with tears, was that loving young mother, pleading with God to care for and guide her boy, and make him a good, pure man. The picture again faded; his features worked convulsively, and the nurse bending over him, caught the whisper, "Oh! God of my boyhood days, forgive!"

Once more came the panoramic view before him, the same room, the same form sitting before the fire, the same sweet, patient face, though the cheek was not so round, and the wrinkles had chased away the dimples, and there were silver threads among the gold; but there was no tiny form in her arms; no, they were empty now, and the hands, clasped so tightly in her lap, looked worn and weary, but that upturned face was so full of yearning and love, and the eyes that gazed into the fire were filled with such intense longing! The pale, trembling lips, though silent, seemed in his fancy to be uttering a prayer for her boy. With a cry of anguish he threw out his arms to clasp that loved form, but it was gone. The tears flowed in torrents over the hard cheeks, upon the pillow; his lips quivered, he clasped his hands, and in a voice of perfect agony, he exclaimed, "Oh God! I have been so wicked! How could I have strayed so far from that angel mother's prayers and love. Pity me, oh, my mother's God, before it be too late."

Suddenly his face lit up with a light almost divine; he seemed to be gazing into the beyond, his hands quietly dropped on his breast, the light gradually faded from his eyes, the breath came slower and slower, until finally it ceased, but that sweet, glad smile still lingered. And the watchers that stood around the cot of that poor, homeless, degraded and forsaken wretch, looked into each others tearful eyes and nodded, as much as to say, "Surely, like the thief on the cross, he has passed through the gate into Paradise." Buffalo Lithia Water in Rheumatic Gout---Cold Water against Hot Water in this Malady.

General Colton Greene, President of the State Savings Bank of Memphis, Tenn., Leaves His Crutches at Buffalo Lithia Springs--Value of This Water in Gout, Uric-Acid Diathesis, Etc., Etc.

BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VA., September 29, 1892.

Colonel Thomas F. Goode:

Dear Sir:—It is now four weeks since I reached Buffalo Lithia Springs, suffering from the effects of recurrent attacks of acute articular gout in both feet, which had lasted and confined me to bed for two months. Though I had biennally, sometimes annually, suffered for short periods, the malady on this last occasion was more violent than before and threatened to take a chronic form. My digestive organs were impaired, my health was shattered, I was crippled, and calcareous deposits were appearing on both feet. Directly on my arrival I copiously used the water of Spring No. 2 conjointly with daily hot baths. A fortnight later I was in condition to walk without the use of crutches, the swelling and inflammation of the parts had measurably subsided, and my health improved. To-day my general health is better than it has been in twelve months, the deposition of uric-acid sediment is dissipated, and my feet, though sensitive to pressure, are restored to their normal condition. Respectfully yours, COLTON GREENE.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER.

Its Great Triumph in Rheumatic Gout.

Statement of Mr. Charles Bernaschina, of Hot Springs, Ark.

Proprietor of Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.:

Dear Sir:—I cheerfully place at your disposal the following statement, showing the remarkable benefit which I have derived from the Buffalo Lithia Waters in a case of Gout. I am a resident of the Hot Springs, Ark. In October, 1885, I was attacked with Rheumatic Gout, in a very severe form, being confined to my bed until the April following. For fourteen consecutive months I used the hot baths, and visited many of the noted mineral resorts of the country, and from time to time since have made use of the hot baths, but without finding any relief. Chalky deposits formed in most of my joints, I was unable to walk or to use my hands. Four months ago to-day I arrived at these Springs, and was for some time after confined to my bed. At the expiration of six weeks slight improvement was perceptible, the chalky deposits began to disappear, and I have continued to improve to the present time, and to an extent that I consider, under the circumstances, almost marvelous, the chalky deposits having almost disappeared. I am now in vigorous general health, and walk readily and actively, walking often several miles over the surrounding hills, and am able to use my hands in dressing myself and at the table, which I was not able to do previous to coming to the Springs.

You are doubtless aware of the fact that my case has attracted unusual attention among your many guests from all parts of the country.

Yours very respectfully,

August 6th, 1892. CHAS. BERNASCHINA.

BIBLE STUDY IN CHINA.

THE holding of an advanced Bible-class at Kui-su, China, is described in a letter from Rev. J. M. Foster to the Baptist Missionary Magazine. He says: I arranged to be at Kui-su, a centrally located chapel in my portion of the field, during the month of January, or the last part of the eleventh and the first half of the twelfth month of the Chinese year. Invitation was given to church members and attendants at chapels to come and study as long as they could leave their home duties; all who were able to bring their own rice should do so. The chapel is not large, so the boat Hope was detailed to serve as accommodation for the two native teachers, and any others not provided for at the chapel. The whole was an experiment, but it was made the subject of prayer, and has apparently been blessed to the good of those who came. The average attendance was about eight, though twelve or more different ones were present, evenly divided between church members and those not yet baptized.

Among the latter was a Chinese school teacher to whom a former preacher gave some tracts more than fifteen years ago. He has never manifested any very deep concern about the truth, but was sufficiently interested to come and study for these four weeks (Chinese schools are closed during the last few months of the year, because the children are needed at home to help in rice harvest, and in grinding the sugar-cane.) I do not know how much this man was impressed by the truth, but he certainly asked an infinite number of questions, and studied all that the class went over faithfully. His interest in the Bible, too, evidently increased, and he was anxious to get at the meaning of passages. It is very difficult for a school teacher to break away from heathenism, because he is sought to write charms, look out lucky days, and many other like things, besides having a shrine to Confucius in the school room for the children to worship. We hope this man may be so led of the Spirit that he will break away, even at great temporal loss, and quit all these follies, and choose the reproach of Christ rather than his present comfort.

We are encouraged to find that they wish to come again and study in the first part of the Chinese year before rice planting. If we can continue this kind of work, the Christians will be better fitted to assume charge of the services at their stations, and to lead others into the light.

At Pu-Ning we are renting a larger shop, where Dr. Scott expects to begin dispensary work ere long. This is a very important point, and one where we are obliged to move with great caution. There is not one Christian in the Pang clan, which rules the city, and is influential all through the outlying region. The New Year has checked our evangelizing, and kept us at home for a few weeks, but soon all our boats will be in motion again.

THE RIGHT WORD.

A GERMAN emigrant widow sat with her children in the waiting-room of a station. A lady passing to a train, struck by the misery in her face, stopped a moment to speak with her. The stranger had but one instant. She passed a little money into the poor woman's hand and said, "You look sad and lonely, but Jesus is with you! He never will leave you alone!" Ten years afterward the woman said: "That word gave me courage for all my life. When I was a child I knew Christ and loved him. I had forgotten him. That chance word brought me back to him."

Is It Right to say that $50 can possibly grow, in 3 years, to $500?

Depends on the facts.

What are the facts?

Too many to print here. See pamphlet, sent free, with a map.

We are taking partners. A man or woman wants to know what $50 is likely to bring in 3 years.

It may not bring 1 cent in 3 years; the business is watering land in a country where nobody lives and nothing grows without water, but where wealth springs out of the ground with water. Takes time; incredible time; so quick.

Pioneers grow vegetables to sell and live on first and fruit to sell next; and then they can pay for water and land. Takes time; but time works wonders there.

LEAVING Scripture testimonies, there is, above all, the inner testimony—the corroborative verdict of the smitten human heart. We cannot believe that our relatives and friends are allowed to pass into a land where former human relations are terminated and obliterated. "That our love for our departed ones continues at all, is in itself both an augury and a promise. If its purpose ended here, it would fall from us when they die, as a withered branch from a living tree." Can we subscribe to a cold philosophy of life and death like that which would permit fellow-pilgrims knit together below in golden links—going hand in hand up to the very gates of glory—then and there to be severed, exchanging only mournful mutual farewells? Worshippers in the house of God on earth, are its quickening and hallowed fellowships to be denied them in heaven? No! Heaven is the ideal home: and, if so, the element of love cannot be wanting in its many mansions.

Our deepest and most sacred feelings and instincts recoil from oblivion tenets. The doctrine of the Communion of Saints, enshrined specially in the creed of the Church militant, must have its counterpart, or rather its perfected realization, in the Church triumphant. The love of husband, wife, parent, child, brother, sister—the purest, most hallowed, most divine experiences of earth, are not to be annihilated in the hour of dissolution, blotted out from the joys of the glorified. Our heart's deepest yearnings say No! "Many waters"—even the waters of Jordan, cannot quench love. It is a poor, selfish, inadequate theology which speaks of these earthly affections as superseded above by something higher and better: that God's love will supplant all subordinate affinities: that the tiny human satellites will be lost and extinguished in the glory of the great central Sun. Why not combine the two? St. John in another of his sublime visions—one of our motto-verses—seems to do so. He assigns not to rival but to co-ordinate forces their due proportions. He puts the divine affection first and highest. If you will, the earthly will be but as a taper glimmering in the sunlight. Be it so. Moreover, even as tapers—subsidiary sources of joy and bliss, they may not be required. What says he? "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." There may be, there shall be "no need of them"—no need with the superlative glory. But they are there, notwithstanding. Earthly sun, moon, star, satellite, are still to shine as lights in the celestial firmament. God is verily to be "all in all."

Dry your tears, mourning children of God! That look in the hour of departure—photographed for ever on your heart of hearts—was not the last. When you uttered the words of the old Roman Christian, "Vale, dulcissimæ," you did so with a happy reservation. It was the farewell of earth alone. You shall meet again. There will be the cadence of familiar tones and chimes in the tide of song which rolls on forever:

Though down the long, dim avenues of the past
Their swift feet fled,
In his eternity the rooms are vast
There wait they to be ours at last;
They are not dead.

And nothing in them dies that was alive;
All that endears
And sanctifies the human must survive.
Of God they are, and in his smile they thrive
Through deathless years.

THE GOSPEL AMONG CANNIBALS.

Rev. Dr. Nassau's Thirty Years' Pioneer Missionary Work on the Ogowe River, in French-Congo, Africa—The Savage Bengas and Galwas—The "Gorilla-Land" of Du Chaillu—Many Native Churches the Result of a Consecrated Life-work.

SOME thirty years ago, the Gospel of Jesus Christ was only known at wide intervals by the tribes of the West Coast of Africa. In those days, missionary work meant much more than it now does; it meant pioneering in the most literal sense, and an abundance of hard work, danger and discomfort. The missionary who then went to the African field did so at much greater risk; for not only were the majority of the tribes still in a savage state, but there was not then any extended European influence in those territories, such as exists at the present time when almost all the civilized governments are working together in the interest of progress and enlightenment. We give below the record of one of those devoted Gospel pioneers who by years of effort and unselfish devotion, have opened up the savage wilderness of the West Coast. This servant of the Master did his share in blazing a path for civilization and Christianity. After nearly thirty years spent in Africa, he has now the gratification of seeing the fruit of his labors in thriving churches and steadily growing congregations, where idolatry, superstition and witchcraft once predominated, with the dark train of vice and wretchedness peculiar to heathen life.

Robert Hamill Nassau was born in Montgomery Co., Pa., in 1835. He entered Princeton, graduating in 1854, and five years later was graduated from the Theological Seminary, and in 1861 from the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania. While still a very young man he took up missionary work, and during his seminary vacations, was a Bible colporteur in Western Missouri and Kansas. Afterward, when he become a missionary in the foreign field, he had many trying experiences, but was probably never nearer to a violent death than on one occasion while colporteuring in Missouri. In the summer of 1857, while the "Border Ruffian" troubles were still fresh, he with a fellow-student happened to be near St. Joe, when a force of armed citizens, hunting for horsethieves, ran across him, and he and his companion were marched to an improvised court. The charge was made that their animal was stolen. It was true that three horses had been missing, and his bore a strong resemblance to one of them. All in vain did he protest his innocence. The situation became serious, with visions of being dragged in the direction of a convenient tree, with a rope held menacingly near.

Finally, the leader of the crowd listened to reason, and decided to afford the young colporteur a chance to prove his innocence. After two weeks' gathering of legal proof of the horse's history for the previous two-and-a-half years, making a story of most remarkable mistaken identity, an alibi, satisfactory even to his captors, was established.

In 1861 Dr. Nassau went out as a missionary under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board, to a station on the island of Corisco, a Spanish colonial possession off the West Coast of Africa, inhabited by a tribe called the Benga. This island station was chosen for the reason that it was supposed to be less unhealthy than the mainland (where the climate is insalubrious owing to poisonous exhalations from the morasses), and that the missionaries could work among the natives to better advantage. They found, however, that Corisco was no healthier than the mainland, and the hope of training the Benga to go out among the other tribes as Gospel workers was doomed to failure.

Dr. Nassau's longest missionary experience was in French-Congo territory, and here, in a most beautiful but savage country, among tribes who had never before heard of the Gospel of Jesus, and many of whom had never even met a white man, he lived and labored successfully for many years, performing noble pioneer missionary work and opening up to others what has since proved a rich spiritual field. In those wilds he had constantly to encounter and overcome not only tremendous natural obstacles, but the suspicion and hostility of savage tribes, some of them cannibals. He found the Bakele, who dwell between the upper and lower courses of the Ogowe River, and the Fans, who occupy most of the region east of the Gaboon, and north of the Ogowe, to be among the most warlike, and frequently at variance with their neighbors and each other. They are light-complexioned muscular and vigorous, and very intelligent, energetic and industrious. Both these tribes practise cannibalism in the inland districts. We give his further experience in his own words:

"My next field after Corisco was at Benita, in the upper part of the French Congo. The worst obstacle to Christian work that I had to encounter was a strong secret society, called the Ukuku, to which men only belonged. It assumed to settle difficulties between individuals that could not be otherwise adjusted and this gave it dignity. The members claimed that the decisions or judgments of the Ukuku were uttered by a spirit or oracle. Some man would change his voice and speak the decision that had been prearranged, and everybody would concede and declare it was the voice of the spirit. If any woman's curiosity should lead her to see the proceedings of the Ukuku, she would be put to death.

"There were no missions there when we went among the Benitas; now there are five prosperous churches. These people believe in a Supreme Being, but, practically, they hold that God, having made man, does not care for him, and we are then left to the operation and control of evil spirits. They believe in a future life. I have known of natives, with their last breath, threatening vengeance upon those who had injured them during life, and saying they would come back and exact retribution. They believe that the future life will be very much like this life; they do not think that there is any marriage, in the future life, but the people eat and drink there as here. Their religious ideas are, of course, very crude.

"We stayed with the Benita people from 1865 till 1871. Then, my first wife having died, I took a furlough and came to this country in 1872 for two years, returning in 1874. I then started a new mission one degree south of the Equator—still pioneering. Indeed the greater part of my missionary work has been that of a pioneer. I started up the Ogowe River in September, 1874, proceeding a distance of 130 miles to a place called Kangwe. My new field was among the Galwa tribe. I had to repeat the same experience of starting in the forest, cutting a way the trees and building a little hut, while we gathered material for a larger house. I have built five houses at different times in mission work. The natives, as a usual thing, have a little mechanical taste and are readily taught simple carpentering.

"I stayed at Kangwe until 1880 and left the station well established, with boys' and girls' schools, and a growing church. The first church on that river, which I organized in 1879, in November, has grown so large that it

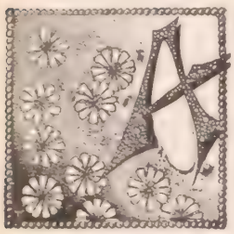
The Tabernacle Pulpit

ONLY A TOUCH.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: "Who touched me." Mark 5: 31



A GREAT crowd of excited people elbowing each other this way and that, and Christ in the midst of the commotion. They were on the way to see him restore to complete health a dying person. Some thought he could effect the cure, others that he could not. At any rate, it would be an interesting experiment. A very sick woman of twelve years' invalidism is in the crowd. Some say her name was Martha, others say it was Veronica. I do not know what her name was; but this is certain: she had tried all styles of cure. Every shelf of her humble home had medicines on it. She had employed many of the doctors of that time when medical science was more rude and rough and ignorant than we can imagine in this time, when the word physician or surgeon stands for potent and educated skill. Professor Lightfoot gives a list of what he supposes may have been the remedies she had applied. I suppose she had been blistered from head to foot, and had tried the compress, and had used all styles of astringent herbs, and she had been mauled and hacked and cut and lacerated until life to her was a plague. Beside that, the Bible indicates her doctors' bills had run up frightfully, and she had paid money for medicines and for surgical attendance and for hygienic apparatus until her purse was as exhausted as her body.

What, poor woman, are you doing in that jostling crowd? Better go home and to bed and nurse your disorders. No! Wan and wasted and faint she stands there, her face distorted with suffering, and ever and anon biting her lip with some acute pain, and sobbing until her tears fall from the hollow eye upon the faded dress; only able to stand because the crowd is so close to her push ing her this way and that. Stand back! Why do you crowd that poor body? Have you no consideration for a dying woman? But just at that time the crowd parts and this invalid comes almost up to Christ; but she is behind him and his human eye does not take her in. She has heard so much about his kindness to the sick, and she does feel so wretched, she thinks if she can only just touch him once it will do her good. She will not touch him on the sacred head, for that might be irreverent. She will not touch him on the hand for that might seem too familiar. She says: "I will, I think, touch him on his coat, not on the top of it, or on the bottom of the main fabric, but on the border, the blue border, the long threads of the fringe of that blue border; there can be no harm in that. I don't think he will hurt me, I have heard so much about him. Beside that, I can stand this no longer. Twelve years of suffering have worn me out. This is my last hope." And she presses through the crowd still further and reaches for Christ, but cannot quite touch him. She pushes still further through the crowd and kneels and puts her finger to the edge of the blue fringe of the border. She just touches it. Quick as an electric shock there thrilled back into her shattered nerves and shrunken veins and exhausted arteries and panting lungs and withered muscles, health, beautiful health, rubicund health. God-given and complete health. The twelve years' march of pain and pang and suffering over suspension-bridge of nerve and through tunnel of bone instantly halted.

Christ recognizes somehow that magnetic and healthful influence through the medium of the blue fringe of his garment had shot out. He turns and looks upon that excited crowd, and startles them with the interrogatory of my text: "Who touched me?" The insolent crowd in substance replied, "How do we know? You get in a crowd like this and you must expect to be jostled. You ask us a question you know we cannot answer." But the roseate and rejuvenated woman came up and knelt in front of Christ, and told of the touch, and told of the restoration, and Jesus said: "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. Go in peace." So Mark gives us a dramatization of the Gospel. Oh, what a doctor Christ is! In every one of our households may he be the family physician.

Notice that there is no addition of help to others without subtraction of power from ourselves. The context says that as soon as this woman was healed, Jesus felt that virtue or strength had gone out of him. No addition of help to others without subtraction of strength from ourselves. Did you never get tired for others? Have you never risked your health for others? Have you never preached a sermon, or delivered an exhortation, or offered a burning prayer, and then felt afterward that strength had gone out of you? Then you have never imitated Christ.

Are you curious to know how that garment of Christ should have wrought such a cure for this suppliant invalid? I suppose that Christ was surcharged with vitality. You know that diseases may be conveyed from city to city by garments as in case of epidemic, and so I suppose that garments may be surcharged with health. I suppose that Christ had such physical magnetism that it permeated all his robe down to the last thread on the border of the blue fringe. But in addition to that there was a divine thrill, there was a miraculous potency, there was an omnipotent therapeutics without which this twelve years' invalid would not have been instantly restored.

Now, if omnipotence cannot help others without depletion, how can we ever expect to bless the world without self-sacrifice? A man who gives to some Christian object until he feels it, a man who in his occupation or profession overworks that he may educate his children, a man who on Sunday night goes home, all his nervous energy wrung out by active service in church, or Sabbath-school, or city evangelization, has imitated Christ, and the strength has gone out of him. A mother who robs herself of sleep in behalf of a sick-cradle, a wife who bears up cheerfully under domestic misfortune that she may encourage her husband in the combat against disaster, a woman who by hard saving and earnest prayer and good counsel, wisely given, and many years devoted to rearing her family for God and usefulness and heaven, and who has nothing to show for it but premature gray hairs and a profusion of deep wrinkles, is like Christ, and strength has gone out of her. That strength or virtue may have gone out through a garment she has made for the home, that strength may have gone out through the sock you knit for the barefoot destitute, that strength may go out through the mantle hung up in some closet after you are dead. So a crippled child sat every morning on her father's front step so that when the kind Christian teacher passed by to school she might take hold of her dress and let the dress slide through her pale fingers. She said it helped her pain so much and made her so happy all the day. Aye, have we not in all our dwelling garments of the departed, a touch of which thrills us through and through, the life of those who are gone thrilling through the life of those who stay? But mark you, the principle I evolve from this subject. No addition of health to others unless there be a subtraction of strength from ourselves. He felt that strength had gone out of him.

Notice also in this subject a Christ sensitive to human touch. We talk about God on a vast scale so much we hardly appreciate his accessibility, God in magnitude rather than God in minutiæ, God in the infinite rather than God in the infinitesimal; but here in my text we have a God arrested by a suffering touch. When in the sham trial of Christ they struck him on the cheek we can realize how that cheek tingled with pain. When under the scourging the rod struck the shoulders and back of Christ, we can realize how he must have writhed under the lacerations. But here there is a sick and nerveless finger that just touches the long threads of the blue fringe of his coat, and he looks around and says, "Who touched me?"

We talk about sensitive people, but Christ was the impersonation of all sensitiveness. The slightest stroke of the smallest finger of human disability makes all the nerves of his head and heart and hand and feet vibrate. It is not a stolid Christ, not a phlegmatic Christ, not a preoccupied Christ, not a hard Christ, not an iron-cased Christ, but an exquisitely sensitive Christ that my text unveils. All the things that touch us touch him, if by the hand of prayer we make the connecting line between him and ourselves complete. Mark you, this invalid of the text might have walked through that crowd all day and cried about her suffering, and no relief would have come if she had not touched him. When in your prayer you lay your hand on Christ, you touch all the sympathies of an ardent and glowing and responsive nature.

You know that in telegraphy there are two currents of electricity. So when you put out your hand of prayer to Christ there are two currents—a current of sorrow rolling up from your heart to Christ, and a current of commiseration rolling from the heart of Christ to you. Two currents. Oh, why do you go unhelped? Why do you go wondering about this and wondering about that? Why do you not touch him?

Are you sick? I do not think you are any worse off than this invalid of the text. Have you had a long struggle? I do not think it has been more than twelve years. Is your case hopeless? So was this of which my text is the diagnosis and prognosis. "Oh," you say, "there are so many things between me and God." There was a whole mob between this invalid and Christ. She pressed through and I guess you can press through.

Is your trouble a home trouble? Christ shows himself especially sympathetic with questions of domesticity, as when at the wedding in Cana he alleviated a housekeeper's predicament, as when tears rushed forth at the broken home of Mary and Martha and Lazarus. Men are sometimes ashamed to weep. There are men who if the tears start will conceal them. They think it is unmanly to cry. They do not seem to understand it is manliness and evidence of a great heart. I am afraid of a man who does not know how to cry. The Christ of the text was not ashamed to cry over human misfortune. Look at that deep lake of tears opened by the two words of the evangelist: "Jesus wept!" Behold Christ on the only day of his early triumph marching on Jerusalem, the glittering domes obliterated by the blinding rain of tears in his eyes and on his cheek; for when he beheld the city he wept over it. O man of the many trials, O woman of the heartbreak, why do you not touch him?

"Oh," says some one, "Christ don't care for me. Christ is looking the other way. Christ has the vast affairs of his kingdom to look after. He has the armies of sin to overthrow, and there are so many worse cases of trouble than mine he doesn't care about me, and his face is turned the other way." So his back was turned to this invalid of the text. He was on his way to effect a cure which was famous and popular and wide-resounding. But the context says, "He turned him about." If he was facing to the north he turned to the south; if he was facing to the east he turned to the west. What turned him about? The Bible says he has no shadow of turning. He rides on in his chariot through the eternities. He marches on crushing sceptres as though they were the crackling alders on a brook's bank, and tossing thrones on either side of him without stopping to look which way they fall. From everlasting to everlasting. "He turned him about." He whom all the allied armies of hell cannot stop a minute or divert an inch, by the wan, sick, nerveless finger of human suffering turned clear about.

Oh, what comfort there is in this subject for people who are called nervous. Of course it is a misapplied word in that case, but I use it in the ordinary parlance. After twelve years of suffering, oh, what nervous depression she must have had. You all know that a good deal of medicine taken if it does not cure leaves the system exhausted, and in the Bible in so many words she "had suffered many things of many physicians, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse." She was as nervous as nervous could be. She knew all about insomnia and about the awful apprehension of something going to happen, and irritability about little things that in health would not have perturbed her. I warrant you it was not a straight stroke she gave to the garment of Christ, but a trembling forearm, and an uncertain motion of the hand, and a quivering finger with which she missed the mark toward which she aimed. She did not touch the garment just where she expected to touch it.

When I see this nervous woman coming to the Lord Jesus Christ, I say she is making the way for all nervous people. Nervous people do not get much sympathy. If a man breaks his arm everybody is sorry, and they talk about it all up and down the street. If a woman has an eye put out by accident, they say: "That's a dreadful thing." Everybody is asking about her convalescence. But when a person is suffering under the ailment of which I am now speaking, they say: "Oh, that nothing, she's a little nervous, that's all," putting a slight upon the most agonizing of suffering.

Now, I have a new prescription to give you. I do not ask you to discard human medicament. I believe in it. When the slightest thing occurs in the way of sickness in my household, we always run for the doctor. I do not want to despise medicine. If you cannot sleep nights do not despise bromide of potassium. If you have nervous paroxysm do not despise morphine. If you want to strengthen up your system do not despise quinine as a tonic. Use all right and proper medicines. But I want you to bring your insomnia, and bring your irritability, and bring all your weaknesses, and with them touch Christ. Touch him not only on the hem of his garments, but touch him on the shoulder where he carries our burden, touch him on the head where he remembers all our sorrows, touch him on the heart, the centre of all his sympathies. Oh yes, Paul was right when he said, "We have not a high priest who cannot be touched."

The fact is Christ himself is nervous. All those nights out of doors in malarial districts where an Englishman or an American dies if he goes at certain seasons. Sleeping out of doors so many nights, as Christ did, and so hungry, and his feet wet with the wash of the sea and the wilderness tramp and the persecution and the outrage must have broken down his nervous system: a fact proved by the statement that he lived so short a time on the cross. That is a lingering death ordinarily, and many a sufferer on the cross has writhed in pain twenty-four hours, forty-eight hours. Christ lived only six. Why? He was exhausted before he mounted the bloody tree. Oh, it is a worn-out Christ, sympathetic with all people worn out.

A Christian woman went to the Tract House in New York, and asked for tracts for distribution. The first day she was out on her Christian errand she saw a policeman taking an intoxicated woman to the station house. After the woman was discharged from custody, this Christian tract distributor saw her coming away, all unkempt and unlovely. The tract distributor went up, threw her arms around her neck, and kissed her. The woman said, "O, my God, why do you kiss me?" "Well," replied the other, "I think Jesus Christ told me to." "Oh, no," the woman said, "don't you kiss me; it breaks my heart: nobody has kissed me since my mother died." But that sisterly kiss brought her to Christ, started her on the road to heaven. The world wants sympathy; it is dying for sympathy, large-hearted Christian sympathy. There is omnipotence in the touch. Oh, I am so glad that when we touch Christ, Christ touches us. The knuckles and the limbs and the joints all falling apart with that living death called the leprosy, a man is brought to Christ. A hundred doctors could not cure him. The wisest surgery would stand appalled before that loathsome patient. What did Christ do? He did not amputate, he did not poultice, he did not scarify. He touched him and he was well. The mother-in-law of the Apostle Peter was in a raging fever; brain fever, typhoid fever, or what, I do not know. Christ was the Physician. He offered no febrifuge, he prescribed no drops, he did not put her on plain diet, He touched her and she was perfectly well.

Two blind men come stumbling into a room where Christ is. They are both entirely sightless. Christ did not lift the eyelid to see whether it was cataract or ophthalmy. He did not put the men into a dark room for three or four weeks. He touched them and they saw everything. A man came to Christ. The drum of his ear had ceased to vibrate and he had a stuttering tongue. Christ touched the ear and he heard, touched his tongue and he articulated. There is a funeral coming out of that gate, a widow following her only boy to the grave. Christ cannot stand it, and he puts his hand on the hearse and the obsequies turn into a resurrection day.

O my brother, I am so glad when we touch Christ with our sorrows he touches us. When out of your grief and vexation you put your hand on Christ, it wakens all human reminiscence. Are we tempted? He was tempted. Are we sick? He was sick. Are we persecuted? He was persecuted. Are we bereft? He was bereft.

St. Yoo of Kermartin one morning went out and saw a beggar asleep on his doorstep. The beggar had been all night in the cold. The next night, St. Yoo compelled this beggar to come up in the house and sleep in the saint's bed, while St. Yoo passed the night on the doorstep in the cold. Somebody asked him why that eccentricity. He replied, "It isn't an eccentricity; I want to know how the poor suffer, I want to know their agonies that I may sympathize with them, and therefore I slept on this cold step last night." That is the way Christ knows so much about our sorrows. He slept on the cold doorstep of an inhospitable world that would not let him in. He is sympathetic now with all the suffering and all the tried and all the perplexed. Oh, why do you not go and touch him?

You utter your voice in a mountain pass and there come back ten echoes, twenty echoes, thirty echoes perhaps, weird echoes. Every voice of prayer, every ascription of praise, every groan of distress has divine response and celestial reverberation, and all the galleries of heaven are filled with sympathetic echoes, and throngs of ministering angels echo, and the temples of the redeemed echo, and the hearts of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost echo and re-echo.

I preach a Christ so near you can touch him—touch him with your guilt and get pardon—touch him with your trouble and get comfort—touch him with your bondage and get manumission. You have seen a man take hold of an electric chain. A man can with one hand take one end of the chain and with the other hand he may take hold of the other end of the chain. Then a hundred persons taking hold of that chain will altogether feel the electric power. You have seen that experiment. Well, Christ with one wounded hand takes hold of one end of the electric chain of love, and with the other wounded hand takes hold of the other end of the electric chain of love, and all earthly and angelic beings may lay hold of that chain, and around and around in sublime and everlasting circuit runs the thrill of terrestial and celestial and brotherly and saintly and divine sympathy. So that if this morning Christ should sweep his hand over this audience and say, "Who touched me?" There would be hundreds and thousands of voices responding: "I! I! I!"

SAVED IN A PRISON CELL.

How John H. Murray, a Criminal, was Converted and became a Faithful Evangelist.

THIS is the age of evangelism, and every day furnishes illustration of the fact that God frequently chooses the most extraordinary instruments for his purposes. Young men and old; women both cultured and simple; men who have occupied high positions socially and commercially, and others who have passed from sin to salvation within the walls of a prison, may all be usefully employed in this common service.

One of the most active of the younger order of evangelists is John H. Murray, who has now charge of the Rescue Mission at Easton, Pa. Mr. Murray, while quite a boy, drifted into crime, and from petty irregularities passed to burglary and highway robbery, finally resulting in imprisonment. Mr. Murray was born in Ohio in 1866, and was arrested the first time when only thirteen years old. He fell into evil company and ran the gamut of juvenile crimes; he frequented saloons and gambling places, drank and associated with sinful people—mistakenly believing he was having "a good time." Smaller crimes led to greater, until, insensibly, he found himself an outlaw and the associate of burglars and robbers. In 1884 he was arrested and convicted.

EVANGELIST JOHN H. MURRAY.

It was while a prisoner that the great change occurred which made of him a new creature. He himself tells the story.

"I was reading an old Bible which I had found in the cell, and turning to the story of the Prodigal Son, I realized in that picture my own case. My career had been a disgraceful one, and now I was reaping the harvest of my sins. My friends had forsaken me, so in my distress I came to myself. I read the life of Jesus, and when I came to the point where they crucified him, I knelt down and prayed to him to have mercy on me. That was the happiest night of all my life, I knew that when I had asked him on my knees to forgive my sins he did it. I repented bitterly, but that night was the sweetest sleep I ever had."

On being released from prison he resolved to consecrate his whole life to the service of him who had emancipated him from sin. He was free before the law of man, and no longer criminal before God.

Colonel Henry H. Hadley, who has established a number of Rescue Missions in different cities, perceived in Mr. Murray a man of more than usual capabilities, and at once secured him to co-operate with him. He has been actively engaged in evangelistic work for some time and is meeting with remarkable success. Col. Hadley says:

"He possesses the wonderful gift of capturing the hearts of his audience and riveting their attention with his first words, or, indeed, before he utters a word, and as Mrs. Bottome once said, 'He draws blood with the first blow.' I once introduced him to a large audience as the 'dying thief' who was converted in the Ohio Penitentiary while reading the Bible through. The curiosity with which he was received immediately changed to sympathetic interest and confidence when he began to speak. His manner and words are eloquent and fascinating, his talk homely, clear, well-chosen and convincing. He does not claim a high education, but is specially gifted in being able to use what he has to the full, and impresses one with the fact that he is a close student of books and men."

When the People's Mission in Rochester was started, three years ago, Mr. Murray was placed in charge and continued there for two years, during which time nearly every church in the city was brought to the support of the Mission and hundreds were converted. When S. H. Hadley and Col. H. H. Hadley started the McAauley Mission in Manchester, N. H., Mr. Murray was sent there and got it well under way. He afterwards opened and established the Rescue Missions at Altoona, Pa., and Easton, Pa. A portrait of Mr. Murray is given on this page.

A TRUTH THAT WENT HOME.

RESCUE work among the most degraded and destitute, is mostly of a depressing nature, but strange incidents sometimes happen. At one of the evening meetings of the Homestead Rescue Mission in Buffalo, not long ago, a keen, bright-looking fellow of the "crook" stamp, arose during the testimonies, and said earnestly:

"What you folks say sounds all right, but there's too many hypocrites around. Folks who says one thing and does something else. I'm the kind of a feller that don't believe in false pretences, an' I won't join no association with them that ain't just as frank. I don't pretend to be anybody, but I'm as good as them that claims to be my betters."

Miss Cutter, the missionary, rose quickly in the back part of the room, and said: "Let me see that man! That's the kind of a man we want in this mission, men who are not hypocrites."

The man turned squarely around, saying: "Here I be."

"My friend," continued Miss Cutter, "Don't you know there will be no hypocrites in heaven? Don't you know that if there was no good money in the world there would be no use of counterfeiting it? Did ——"

"There!" cried the man, "that's jest like you church people—calling a feller names and twittin' on the past," and he seized his hat and indignantly went out.

It was afterward learned that he had just finished serving a term for counterfeiting. The truth spoken by the missionary had gone home.

A LAME CHINAMAN.

MISS C. PATMER, of the China Inland Mission station at Hub-Shan, writes: "My mornings are taken up with visiting and seeing the sick people. One morning, about three months ago, I was busy with my patients as usual, when a woman came and asked me to go and see a man who had met with an accident. She added, 'he cannot walk; won't you please give him some medicine? He has tried Chinese doctors a fortnight, and is worse instead of better.' So I gave a little simple remedy. The next day she again appeared, saying, 'He has used the medicine, and is much better; would you please go and see him?' I went to see the patient. Poor man, he was suffering badly. After making him as comfortable as circumstances allowed, Sannat, the Bible-woman, preached unto him Jesus. The Lord blessed the simple means used from the very first day. In about three weeks he could put his foot to the ground a little, but not walk. I told him as soon as he got a little better, to come to worship. He said, 'If my son is at home, I will come on Sunday.' To my surprise, on Sunday he appeared, his son carrying him on his back, and behind followed his wife. From that time they have attended regularly, and have daily prayers in their house. The man is now able to work; and what is best of all, their souls are saved."

A TEMPERANCE COAT.

ONE bitter winter's night, the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse had taken a cab from a London suburb, and on reaching home bade the driver come in and get something warm and comfortable, but non-intoxicating. He noticed that "cabby" had no overcoat, and inquired how it was that he was so insufficiently clad. The man explained his poverty, and Mr. Pearse said: "Well, now, I've got a coat upstairs that would just suit you. But before I give it to you I'm bound to tell you that there is something very peculiar about that coat, and it is right I should explain it to you before you put it on." "What's that, sir?" said the man, considerably mystified, and not knowing whether he might not find it wise to decline the mysterious garment. Said Mr. Pearse, solemnly, "that coat never had a glass of beer or spirits inside of it from the day it was made until now. I want you to promise me as long as you wear that coat you will let 'the drink' alone." "All right, sir," said cabby, holding out his hand, "all right, sir; I won't upset the coat by putting any drink inside of it." Many months afterwards Mr. Pearse met the same man again, and learnt that he had kept to his bargain and that the coat had never been disgraced by drink.

REVERENCE AND FIDELITY.

S. S. Lesson for June 4. Eccl. 5: 1 12 Golden Text, Rom. 12 : 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"KEEP thy foot when thou goest to the house of God; for to draw near to hear is better than to give the sacrifice of fools." (R.V.) When God revealed himself to Moses in the burning bush, he gave him the command: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." (Ex. 3: 5.) And the same command was given to Joshua when the Lord revealed himself as the Captain of the host of the Lord: "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy." (Josh. 5: 15.)

God is There.

No noise of human footsteps, no sign of man's presence, no announcement that he is there, marks the worship of a holy man of God. The fact of God's presence overshadows, and for the time obliterates his own from his consciousness. God's presence brought Ezekiel, Daniel, and the apostle John down on their faces, as helpless, powerless dead men before him.

How many of those who go, professedly to worship God, be it in the churches, chapels, Mission Halls, or wheresoever, know anything of this spirit of holy reverence which fears to make a sound in the presence of the All Holy One? When one enters a meeting where God's children come together to worship, and to study his Word, and, till the very last moment, talking is heard all over the room, where in the consciousness of the presence of God? One cannot but be conscious that that those who find it possible thus to occupy every moment with what they have to say, and what has occupied them, have not really come together to meet with God at all, but only with one another. They have not come to hear what the Lord has to say to them, but to hear perhaps some preacher, or to say something themselves. The Pharisee, when he came into the temple, "prayed with himself": there was nothing in his prayer which manifested a consciousness of the presence of God. He had not put off the shoes from his feet. His whole attitude, his whole presence, his whole prayer spoke of himself, and he departed from the temple having manifested himself, but not having met with God. No more was accomplished by his prayer than by the senseless noise made by the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel; neither they nor the Pharisee had any result from their prayer.

The first necessity for real worship, whether in secret communion with God, or in the congregation, is the Certainty of the Presence of God.

He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek him. (Heb. 11: 6.) If we believe he is present, we shall act in accordance with our belief, and there will be the same regard to his presence, the same holy reverance which makes the seraphim in the unseen world veil their faces and their feet that they may not be seen. (Isa. 6: 2.) There will be the instinct to be silent. How do we come to believe that he is? By the same power which teaches us all the things that be of God, the Holy Spirit. "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. And how really as Christ was in the world in the days [illegible] any needy one, there he was with his ready [illegible] sick, the sorrowful, the needy, never found him unwilling. The Holy Spirit strives with man now as in the days before the flood. There are times when every man, without seeking it, is drawn by the Holy Spirit into a [illegible] must be real with the Holy Ghost, and take for granted that he is leading us without waiting for a feeling, because it says, "When he is come he will guide you unto all truth." (John 15: 13.) We must take for granted that he is guiding our prayers even if we have no feeling of fervency. (Rom. 8: 26.) His work is to lead us away from our feelings to the reality of God, away from what we are to what he is. We may have the best of feelings, and yet be very irreverent. We cannot know by the feeling that the holy God is present, and lightly intrude what is of ourselves.

Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God; for to draw nigh is better than to offer the sacrifice of fools.

To Draw Nigh.

This is true worship, when we take into consideration to whom we draw nigh. There is a child of God who, when he speaks of praying for anyone, says: "When I drew near to God for him." The Epistle of the Hebrews is full of drawing near to God. "We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but One that hath been tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace that we may receive mercy and find grace to help us in time of need." (Heb. 4: 15, 16, R. V.) Alone, sinners must stand afar off, but coming in the name of, and together with, our great High Priest, who brings his own blood to atone for our sins, we may draw nigh, intensely nigh, and always nearer to the throne of grace. How different this from offering the sacrifice of fools! How different from the miserable mistaken conceit, which imagines that there is some value in the prayers or the praises of self made fruit of our own will, our own reason, our own understanding, or anything of our own, independent, like Cain's altar, of the blood of the Lamb. There is no drawing nigh without the Blood. The disannulling of the law makes room for the bringing in of a better hope "through which we draw nigh unto God." The hope of drawing nigh, through our unaided obedience to God, is a vain hope; but through the precious blood "I ought" becomes "I may, and I can." And "He is able to serve unto the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." (R.V.) And yet again "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus by the way which he hath dedicated for us, a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh; and having a great High Priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our body washed with pure water." (R.V.)

Thus we see how we may draw nigh: not independently of, but through the Person of Another, in the name of Another, by the blood of Another, but with true hearts and real assured trust in that Other, our High Priest, Jesus Christ. Impossible to draw thus nigh, and not to worship, even if we do not speak.

Worship does not Consist in Words, but in nearness to God. "Therefore be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven and thou upon earth, wherefore let thy words be few." Eloquent prayers belong more to earth than to heaven, and have more of man in them than of God. "A broken and a contrite heart he will not despise." Let the Holy Spirit dictate the prayer. "The spirit should fail before me and the souls which I have made," saith "the High and Holy One that inhabiteth eternity," and that which most touches God in every real prayer is the Spirit's intercession with groanings which cannot be uttered, because he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit. God searcheth the heart not to see how earnest we are, but how much of the mind of the Spirit we have in our prayers "because he maketh intercession for the saints according to God." Then prayer becomes divine, and the Spirit of God within answers to the will of God in heaven. God is in heaven and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few. A self-conscious prayer, however beautiful the sentiments, is not necessarily a prayer that is heard. "For a dream cometh through multitude of business: and a fool's voice with a multitude of words."

Silence

is a grace which few possess, and which few know the power of. Those whose words tell most when they are spoken, are those who know how to refrain from speaking. A silent man has opportunity, while others are dissipating the time by useless talking, to pray over that which they speak of; and thus when his turn comes to speak, he has got his matter made out with God, and he is ready. Our Master knew the unruly nature of the tongue so well, that he never ventured to speak at all on earth, except the words which the Father gave him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AN ORIENTAL WORSHIPPER.

THE book of Ecclesiastes, from which the lesson is taken, has always had a special charm for thoughtful readers. It deals with the difficult problems of life, which still perplex us, and which we are no nearer solving than was the author of the book. The mystery surrounding the book is another reason for the interest it excites. We have begun to understand it better of late, since learned men have given less attention to theology and more to the Bible itself; but even now there are many parts of it that are obscure. It appears, from the critical study which has been devoted to the book, that it was not written by Solomon, as was generally supposed, but by an author about six hundred years after the wise king's death. There are several reasons for this conclusion, two of which are worthy of mention. One is that words occur in the book which were not in use in Solomon's day, but were added to the Hebrew language during the captivity in Babylon. A second reason is based on an expression found in the twelfth verse of the first chapter: "I, the preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem." The Hebrews were very precise in the use of their tenses and there was no period of Solomon's life in which that profound scholar would have used the expression. He would have written, "I am king." But the expression would be perfectly natural with a later writer who, in teaching the lessons of Solomon's life, threw his sermon into the personal style common in those days, and made Solomon himself the speaker, as Shakespeare put words in the mouths of Richard and Henry which were consistent with their character, but which no one supposes they actually spoke.

The author calls himself Coheleth, the preacher. The question he discusses in his work is, how to make the best use of life. What is the best thing a man can do with his life? What shall he strive after? What is the highest and best good man can attain? The statement of the conditions which he saw around him and proposed to study, occupies the first eleven verses of the first chapter. Then the author describes his experiences in seeking the chief good of life successively in wisdom, in pleasure, in business, in politics and in wealth. They all disappoint him; he succeeds in each, but he is not happy. Finally he comes to the conclusion that the happy man is he who cheerfully and tranquilly enjoys the present life, while he trusts God for the life to come. In the lesson of to-day, the preacher turns his attention to the house of God. There he sees men with their minds preoccupied with worldly affairs, making prayers in which they do not put their hearts and making vows that they never intend to pay. Then he goes into the city and sees them perplexed with the anomalies of life, injustice, oppression, and poverty and he bids them not become misanthropic but console themselves with the thought that there is a God seeing and guiding all the affairs of life and also reminding them that the rich are not so happy, nor the poor so miserable, as they appear.

Therefore let thy words be few. If a man were admitted into the presence of a powerful monarch at certain intervals and had the privilege of asking for anything that he needed, he would be little likely to learn a vague speech by heart and repeat it mechanically at each audience. Yet it is quite common for men to offer the same prayer to God almost without thinking what they are saying. The story is told of a Scotchman whose child was ill, that his wife begged him to pray that its life might be spared. True to his old instincts, the good man kneeled down devoutly, and went out on the well-worn track, as he was wont to do in the prayer-meetings at the kirk. Through the routine petition he plodded along until he reached, at last, the honored quotation: "Lord, remember thine ancient people, and turn again the captivity of Zion!" A mother's heart could hold its patience no longer: "Eh, man!" the woman broke forth impetuously; "you are aye drawn out for the Jews, buts its our bairn that's a-deein'." Then, clasping her hands, she cried: "Oh! help us, Lord, and give our darling back to us if it be thy holy will; but if he is to be taken away from us, make us know thou wilt have him to thyself!" That wife knew what it was to pray a real prayer; and to the throne of grace she went, asking directly what she wanted most.

A dream cometh through the multitude of business. When the mind is full of business or amusements or any worldly matter, real prayer is impossible. The man's body may be kneeling in private prayer, or he may be sitting in church with his eyes fixed on the preacher and yet his mind be far away in a reverie or dream. Worship of that kind is useless; it is mocking God. Not long ago a young Christian fell into great distress about not being able to pray more earnestly. He went often upon his knees, he made long prayers but he went away empty and unsatisfied. "Have you followed the Master's rules?" asked an old preacher to whom he told his trouble. The young man said he thought he had. "You entered into your closet?" "Yes." "How about shutting the door? Did you shut out all your business worries? all your plans for pleasure? all your self-esteem?" The young Christian felt with a thrill that the speaker had found out the secret of his discomfort in prayer.

The profit of the earth is for all. There are, however, many who do not get their share. That is chiefly due to the selfishness with which our race has mismanaged social conditions. The earth produces enough food to satisfy every living thing upon it; but there are some who have more than they need or can use, while others perish from hunger. We have become so accustomed to see this condition of affairs, that its injustice does not impress us. An incident which occurred in one of the recent polar expeditions illustrates the situation. A party of American explorers were awaiting relief. Provisions ran short and it was doubtful if there would be sufficient to keep the men alive until they were rescued. The Captain took account of the food there was, and gave an order that so much should be given every day to each man. In this way he hoped the provisions would last until help came. But the provisions disappeared more rapidly than they should have done. A watch was set and it was found that one of the men was stealing them. After receiving his share for the day, he would crawl to the store and take more and eat it. Every one felt that the man was an enemy. If his depredations went on they might all die of hunger before help came. The man was called up and warned that he was endangering the lives of the whole party by eating more than his share. He was selfish, however, and did not care who died, if he could satisfy his own appetite and so he stole again. Then a council was held and it was decided to kill him, and he was shot, lest by taking more than his share he might cause all to die.

The king himself is served by the field. His station does not raise him above the common needs of humanity. He depends like the poorest of his people on the earth yielding her increase. The basis of wealth is the product of the land. The king must depend ultimately for his subsistence on the results of the toil of the laborer. It is he who produces the property from which the revenue of the government is derived. The fact is often forgotten by kings and nobles and millionaires who often despise the working man and oppress him. Many years ago over the door of an inn in London hung a sign representing the four ruling elements of the government. It was the picture of four men standing upon the shoulders of each other. At the top stood the king; on his breast was the legend, "I govern all;" under him the soldier, and on his breast the motto, "I fight for all;" under him stood the clergyman, and on his breast the motto, "I pray for all;" at the bottom stood the laborer with brawny sinews, every nerve strained to support the burden resting upon him, and on his breast was the motto, "I pay for all."

The Gospel Among Cannibals.

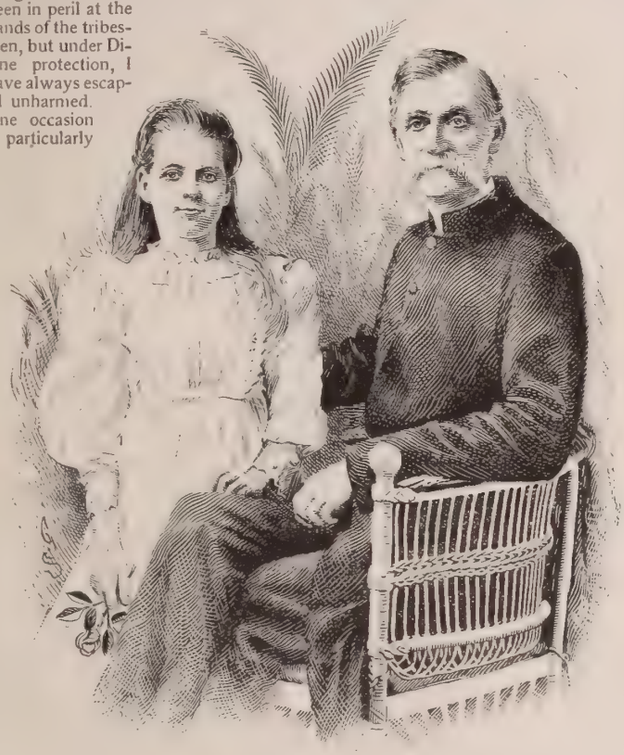
is now sub-divided into four branches, with an aggregate membership of four hundred. It has a white pastor, but the church officers are natives.

"I came back on a second furlough in 1880, returning to the field, married in 1881. I then went seventy miles further up the Ogowe river and established a new station, called Talaguga, right among the cannibal Fang tribe. At different times, my life has been in peril at the hands of the tribesmen, but under Divine protection, I have always escaped unharmed. One occasion I particularly recall. A native—a refugee who had been guilty of some offence—came to my place for shelter, and shortly afterward a native chief arrived with a party of thirteen armed followers, and demanded that I deliver him up. I refused, and on the chief attempting to force an entrance to my house, I opposed force with force, believing the man's life to be in immediate peril. We wrestled in the doorway, the chief striving to get in and trying to use his gun, the barrel of which I had grasped, and I exerting all my muscular power to keep him out. I was for the moment the stronger, and besides, I was defending a principle, and that principle was that the mission premises should be a sacred refuge and open to all travelers and visitors, and that any man who landed on those premises must be safe. If I had allowed the chief to force his way in I would have had no influence thereafter with the tribes. I always carried a gun as protection against the wild animals one meets in those forests, but I had never raised it against my fellow-man nor did I then; but the natives did not know whether I might not shoot. At this juncture, and when a tragedy seemed not improbable, my wife, who was standing calmly and prayerfully watching the struggle from a little eminence nearby, sent me a little pencilled note, suggesting that I should inform the chief and his people that unless they withdrew, I would summon the French troops at the military station not very many miles distant. This would probably have brought matters to a crisis at once, as the natives stand in dread of the troops; but fortunately it was not needed. The chief's own people dragged him away and took his gun from him, and when I saw this I put mine aside, and they then said to me: "You are right, and he (the chief) is in the wrong." This conclusion was not surprising, as their own laws require that a guest should be protected by his host at any risk, and I was simply following the native custom.

"From that time my premises were safe from intrusion; people would come there and know they were safe. After the trouble I have related, one of the chief's own people said, "We made a mistake to-day coming on the missionary's ground." Two days later, I was greatly pleased to receive a visit from the chief himself. He came in peace and brought me chickens, goats, and other things and laid these at my feet, begging me to restore my friendship to him. We were stanch friends afterward. I stayed there nine years; my wife died there and left me with a little daughter, whom I kept there and to whom I was both father and mother. I trained and reared her in that country, solely with the aid of a good native Christian woman, until she was seven years old, and then I ught her to the United States where she now is.



MISSIONARY R. H. NASSAU, M.D., D.D., AND HIS DAUGHTER MAY.

"Cannibalism still exists among the tribes of the Ogowe," continued Dr. Nassau. "The old people practice it, but the young men are beginning to be ashamed of it and deny it. It is difficult of detection in the towns. In my own experience, however, there were two instances that may be accepted as evidence of the fact of its existence. It must be remembered that the events I am about to relate occurred after the people had begun to be somewhat civilized.

"A member of a neighboring tribe came to the village to sell ivory, and was sitting quietly in the village street. A certain man in the village, who was violently enraged at some other villager from a distance, rushed out with his gun and fired wildly, and the bullet struck the stranger and killed him. Now, the question came up: What shall be done with the body of this stranger? and right here is where the cannibalistic propensity cropped out. There were three parties in the town council. One party—the least civilized of the three—said: 'It is meat; let us eat it.' The second and half civilized party said, 'He was of a lower tribe; we do not care to bury him; let us throw the body into the river.' Those who were beginning to be Christianized said: 'He is a stranger and our guest; let us give him an honorable burial.' This third party, constituting the Christians, gave him a proper burial.

"My little daughter was with me when the next instance occurred and we both saw it. We were traveling in my boat (a craft thirty feet long and rowed by a crew of six natives), to a point twenty miles down the Ogowe river. As we floated along quietly past a village, I heard a voice at the landing-place, calling out: 'Come, buy meat!' and, I saw a man holding up some object to the gaze of my boatmen. My daughter and I, being under the canopy, could not be identified as white persons at that distance, otherwise the man on shore would have doubtless kept quiet. 'We have been down river and killed two men,' he cried. 'Come, buy meat!' And then, with a shudder, I recognized the thing he held as a human arm! I turned away from it, and a word to the rowers soon drew us past the sickening sight.

"With these people, cannibalism is not a question of hunting human game for the purpose of eating it; I don't think they ever do that. Having killed an enemy, they conclude the best way to dispose of the body is to treat it as 'meat' and eat it. That is really what cannibalism to-day amounts to, on the West Coast at least. It is only a question of time when the last traces of it shall have disappeared."

Dr. Nassau's experience in Africa, like that of Dr. Kerr in China (recently related in these columns), is a powerful argument in behalf of medical training as an important part of missionary equipment.

"I regard medical knowledge as almost indispensable," he said, "for the sake of the missionaries themselves, if for no other reason. In all the thirty-two years of my African experience, I have never had the African fever. My first wife died of it; but my second wife, who had been three years in that country, never had even a touch of it. Medical knowledge enables one to take the necessary precautions to avoid it. I formed a precautionary habit of fortifying myself by proper treatment before going into danger, in order to prevent myself taking the fever, instead of waiting until I contracted it and then beginning treatment, after it had already invaded the system. And I may say truthfully that I have been more exposed in camping out in sun, rain and in generally insalubrious conditions than any of my associates in the mission field.

"The native priest is also the native doctor in Africa. I think that probably they do have some drugs of medicinal value; but their theory is that the drug is efficient only because of the spirit they associate with it, and which, entering into the body of the sick person, drives out the evil spirit that has caused the disease. I suppose in cases where the sick man gets well, that the drug was really good. There are barks and leaves that they use that have unquestionable medicinal value; but they will not tell a stranger from what tree the leaf or bark comes. The special branch of medicine that would be most useful there would be surgery, because the native doctors know nothing about surgery. They would not attempt to amputate and do not know how to set a bone. The natives have frightful abcesses which ought to be opened, but the doctors do not know where to cut them. One of the most startling cases of native surgery I ever witnessed occurred near my own station. Two men who were friends were out hunting and accidentally became separated in the thicket. One of them mistook the other for a wild beast and shot him, the bullet penetrating his breast. He was taken to his home in the town, and the natives very properly concluded that the bullet should be extracted. Then the native doctor, in order to extract it, made a perpendicular incision in the man's chest, extending down to the last rib, and then he cut diagonally across and actually lifted the wall of the chest and groped among the vitals for the ball. He got it. But here his surgery failed, for he sent the man to me to be sewed up. But the patient was dead!

"In Africa," added Dr. Nassau, "one needs quinine, although it can easily be overdone. Lemon juice in a cup of good strong tea will frequently remove biliousness and avert more serious complications. I do not believe in stimulants. They can never be used with safety in Africa as a beverage."

Little May Nassau, whose portrait, along with that of her father, is given on the first page of this issue, is a native of Africa and the first white girl born in the French Ogowe. Her first syllables were lisped in the African tongue and it is the language to which she is most habituated, although she talks English fluently, having learned rapidly since she came to this country. Dr. Nassau's mission stations on the Ogowe River were popular not only with the natives, but with missionaries and other white men who frequently came from points far distant to enjoy his hospitality. As a hunter and savant, no less than as missionary and physician, he was distinguished by the valuable pioneer work he accomplished during these more than thirty years' residence on the West coast. De Brazza, the Governor of the French Congo Colony, famous as an explorer, was his occasional guest. Few men have had so many exciting experiences in Africa as De Brazza, who has hobnobbed with many kings and potentates. An illustration on the first page shows De Brazza conducting a "palaver" with Renoke, one of the West Coast monarchs. The latter sits surrounded by his admiring wives and courtiers, blowing wreaths of smoke from an immense pipe, the bowl of which is kept supplied by a naked gamin. The territory of French Congo is the same of which Paul Du Chaillu wrote in his earlier books on African explorations. It is the "Gorilla Land" of his travels, and lies in the very centre of what may be designated as the gorilla belt; for, strangely enough, that animal is found within a few degrees north and south of the Equator and nowhere else. Dr. Nassau, in his hunting expeditions, has had frequent encounters with the giant ape, and bears testimony to the absolute accuracy of Du Chaillu's description of the gorilla, which, when first published, excited general wonder and incredulity. It is harder to hunt then any other animal, and the adults will not bear to be captured alive. Indeed, this can only be accomplished by taking them in pits, for it would require the strength of many men to capture them. Dr. Nassau, sometime ago, sent the brains of three gorillas to the Academy of Natural Science of Philadelphia, for purpose of comparative analysis. He had two live gorillas in Africa, and hoped to bring them on, but was disappointed.

THE HEART OF A CHILD.

A CURIOUS-LOOKING old woman, having a bundle in her hand, and walking with painful effort, sat down on a curbstone to rest, writes "Pansy." A group of three little ones, the oldest about nine, stopped in front of the old woman, saying never a word, but watching her face. She smiled. Suddenly the smile faded, and a corner of the old calico apron went up to wipe away a tear. Then the oldest child asked:

"Are you sorry because you have not got any children?"

"—I had children once, but they are all dead," whispered the woman, a sob.

"I am sorry," said the little girl, as her chin quivered. "I'd give you one of my little brothers, but I haven't got but two, and I don't believe I'd like to spare one."

"God bless you, child—bless you forever," sobbed the old woman, and for a minute her face was buried in her apron.

"But I'll tell you what I'll do," seriously continued the child, "You may kiss us all once, and if little Ben isn't afraid, you may kiss him four times, for he's just as sweet as candy."

Pedestrians who saw three well-dressed children put their arms around that strange old woman's neck and kiss her, were greatly puzzled. They didn't know the hearts of children.

THE GREAT CAUSE OF CRIME.

Lord Coleridge, the Lord Chief-Justice of England, recently said that judges are "weary with calling attention to drink as the principal cause of crime," and declared that he "can keep no terms with a vice that fills our goals, destroys the comfort of homes and the peace of families, and debases and brutalizes the people of the islands."

WHY COMPLAIN?

THE largest number of complainers you shall find among those of us who have lucrative professions, large stores, well-warmed houses, luxuriant wardrobes and plenty of attendants. It would be well if, when tempted to complain, we would go down to see how other people have it. Saadi, the poet of Persia, in his poverty, walked the streets barefooted and soliloquized day after day: "What a pity that I, the greatest poet in Persia, should have no shoes!" "No shoes!" he constantly complained to himself, until one day he met a man who had no feet. "Ah!" he said, "that man is worse off than I am. I have no shoes, but he has no feet." According to my calculation, in the six thousand years of the world's existence there must have been about two million days of sunshine, allowing one hundred and ninety-five thousand days for storm. Of the myriads of blossoms on my peach orchard there was not one blossom that did not beat Walter Scott's Marmion or John Milton's Paradise Lost. In weeding out one patch of cantaloupes I threw over the fence about five thousand Tennysons and Longfellows. Nothing but Omnipotence could have made legs strong enough to hold up the great Thanksgiving table of a world. Every grasshopper has a solo, and every snow-flake a psalm, and every honeysuckle a censer, and every pond lily is a gondola for eternal glories to sail in, and there are pyramids in the cones of the white pine, and the place of the sunset is where the river of delight flashes into the sea of the great Forever. Amid so much beauty and luxuriance how can we complain.

It would be well if, not only in looking at our own condition, but at other people, we set out the sparkle instead of the gloom. With five hundred faults of our own, we ought to let somebody else have at least one. When there is such excellent hunting on our own ground, let us not with rifle and greyhound-pack spend all our time in scouring our neighbor's lowlands. I am afraid the imperfections of other people will kill us yet. All the vessels on the sea seem to be in bad trim except our schooner. A person full of faults is most merciless in his criticism of the faults of others. How much better, like the sun, to find light wherever we look, letting people have their idiosyncrasies and every one work in his own way. But people in the critical mood groan after what they call the good old days. They say: "Just think of the pride of people in our time." O ye modern hair-dressers, stand aghast at the locks of our ancestry! They say our ministers are all askew, but just think of our clergymen entering a pulpit with their hair fixed up in the shape of some of the ancient bishops. The great George Washington had his horses' hoofs blackened when about to appear on a parade, and writes to Europe, ordering sent for the use of himself and family, "one silver-laced hat, one pair of silver shoe buckles, a coat made of fashionable silk, one pair of gold sleeve buttons, six pairs of kid gloves, one dozen most fashionable cambric pocket handkerchiefs," besides ruffles and tucker. Talk about dissipations, ye who have ever seen the old-fashioned sideboard! Talk of parties of to-day and keeping of late hours! Why, did they not have their bees and sausage-stuffings and tea parties and dances that for heartiness and uproar utterly eclipsed all the waltzes, lancers, redowas and breakdowns of the nineteenth century? The world was then such a bad place that I do not see how our fathers and mothers could have been induced to stay in it, although on our account I am glad they consented.

The world is coming under the domination of the intelligent races. The great characteristics of these races, as you trace them down from the tenth century in England until this present hour, are their love of liberty, their obedience to law and their desire for progress. While these races have sometimes abused their power and sought advancement in improper ways, their main tendencies have been right, and no philanthropist can read the tendencies of the times in which we live without rejoicing that the intelligent races are becoming dominant in all the earth.

BIBLE PICTURES.

WHAT a poor world this would be if it were not for pictures! I refer to your memory and mine when I ask if your knowledge of the Holy Scriptures has not been mightily augmented by the wood-cuts or engravings in the old family Bible, out of which father and mother read, and laid on the table in the old homestead when you were boys and girls. The Bible scenes which we all carry in our minds were not gotten from the Bible typology, but from the Bible pictures. To prove the truth of it in my own case, the other day I took up the old family Bible which I inherited. Sure enough, what I have carried in my mind of Jacob's ladder was exactly the Bible engraving of Jacob's ladder; and so with Samson carrying off the gates of Gaza; Elisha restoring the Shunamite's son; the massacre of the innocents; Christ blessing little children; the Crucifixion and the Last Judgment. My idea of all these is that of the old Bible engravings which I scanned before I could read a word.

The great intelligence abroad about the Bible did not come from the general reading of the book, for the majority of the people read it but little, if they read it at all; but all the sacred scenes have been put before the great masses, and no printer's ink, but the pictorial art must have the credit of the achievement. First, painter's pencil for the favored few, and then engraver's plate or wood-cut for millions on millions!

I implore all parents to see that in their households they have neither in book, nor newspaper, nor on canvas anything that will deprave. Pictures are no longer the exclusive possession of the affluent. There is not a comfortable home that has not specimens of wood-cut or steel engraving, if not of painting, and your whole family will feel the moral uplifting or depression. Have nothing on your wall or in books that will familiarize the young with scenes of cruelty or wassail; have only those sketches made by artists in elevated moods, and none of those scenes that seem the product of artistic delirium tremens. Pictures are not only a strong but a universal language. The human race is divided into almost as many languages as there are nations, but the pictures may speak to people of all tongues. Volapuk, many have hoped, with little reason, would become a world-wide language, and printer's types have no emphasis compared with it. We say that children are fond of pictures; but notice any man when he takes up a book, and you will see that the first thing that he looks at is the pictures. Have only those in your house that appeal to the better nature. One engraving has sometimes decided an eternal destiny.

A. E. Cox, Navasota, Tex. What is the meaning of 1. Corinthians 6: 2, 3?

The apostle was condemning the practice of Christians appealing to heathen courts of law for judgment in disputes with each other. He urged them when they had a dispute with other Christians to submit it to the arbitration of the Church and reminded them that in much weighty matters Christians were to act as judges. We are not told in what way saints will judge angels but Christ's own words (Luke 22: 30) show that in the millennial kingdom, they will be invested with judicial powers which at present are not fully explained.

Chandler Barber, Strykerville, N. Y. 1. How old is Queen Victoria? 2. How many living children has she? 3. How many married and to whom? 4. Which one will succeed to the crown at her decease?

1. Seventy-four. 2. Seven living children. 3. All are married as follows: Princess Victoria, is the widow of the late Emperor Frederick of Germany; Albert Edward, Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra, of Denmark; Alfred Ernest Albert, Duke of Edinburgh, to Grand Duchess Marie of Russia; Helena Augusta Victoria, to Prince Frederick Christian of Schleswig-Holstein; Louise Caroline Alberta, to John, Marquis of Lorne; Arthur, Duke of Connaught married to Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia; and Beatrice Mary Victoria Theodora, to Prince Henry Maurice of Battenberg. 4. Prince of Wales is the next in line of succession to the throne.

Jordan Dunning Lander, Mass. I recently listened to a sermon on baptism, and one of the preacher's strong points was that "it was impossible for John to have stood in the River Jordan long enough to baptize even a few, because of its swift and ice-cold current, which comes rushing down from the snows of Mount Lebanon at the rate of about two hundred miles per hour, and its hurrying on so rapidly gives it no chance to be warmed by the hot climate. A man or beast couldn't cross it without being carried away in its current."

You may have misunderstood the speaker in some particulars; certainly no river in the world has a current that runs two hundred miles per hour. There is no doubt that the Jordan is a swift-flowing river; but the water, at the spot where John used to baptize, is calm and safe, both in spring and summer. Anyone can stand in it and bathe as long as he likes, the water being in those seasons of moderate temperature and very agreeable, so that one could remain in it and baptize as many persons as he pleased. This place is called by the natives "Hajla," and is the traditional site of Bethabara, which is the place, as we learn from the Scriptures, where John used to baptize. A few miles above where the Jordan throws its water into the Dead Sea, the river is wide and deep, and people are carried across in small canoes. This place, however, is a considerable distance from the scene of baptism. In winter, the Jordan water is very cold, and it is true that one could not stand in it long.

R. P. Mylan, Ala. What does Christ mean by new wine breaking old bottles, in Mark 2: 21, 22?

He was speaking of bottles made of skins which were in common use in Palestine. They were liable to break under fermentation of the wine. The power of the new Gospel he was preaching could not be contained in the narrow limits of the old Jewish system of laws and ordinances.

F. Middleton, Viola Dale, Man. 1. Is it possible to attain sinless perfection in this life? 2. Is sanctification instantaneous or a gradual process? 3. If it is possible to attain perfection would the perfect person be liable to fall away?

1. Christ enjoins us to aim at perfection and that goal should always be kept before us. Some attain nearer to it than others, but we have never heard of anyone who became absolutely perfect. Some have claimed it, but those who knew them best were least disposed to admit the validity of their claim. 2. Sanctification is a gradual process beginning at conversion and increasing as the subject yields up more and more his own will and inclinations to the influence of the Holy Spirit. 3. There is always need of vigilance. The Apostle Paul dreaded lest he should become a castaway. It is, however, a ground of encouragement that those who love God and look to him for strength will be mercifully preserved from falling away. We believe that no person who has once been really converted will be finally lost. He may fall into grievous sin as Peter did, but God will bring him to repentance and restoration.

Neither that nor the Lord's Supper have any saving power.——S. M. Davidson, Bells Valley, Va. No; the Lord's Day is a day of loving commemoration and the Christian will cheerfully consecrate it to Christ's service rather than to mere physical rest. C. H. H. Dodge, Spring Valley, Minn. 1. What miracles did Jesus perform during his childhood (not found in the Bible.) 2. Who were the Ante-Nicene fathers? 3. Was the origin of baptism pagan?

The Evangelists pass over the boyhood of Jesus with the simple remark that his obedience, intelligence and piety, won the affections of all who knew him (Luke 2: 40, 50, 51.) There is no authentic record to show that he performed miracles during his childhood, although the Romish Church preserves certain traditions to that effect. The Ante-Nicene fathers were those whose writings date before the Council of Nice A.D. 325. The chief among them are: Justin Martyr, Hermias, Dionysius of Corinth, Hegesippus, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus bishop of Antioch, Irenaeus bishop of Lyons, Minucius Felix, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Origen head of the catechetical school at Alexandria, Cyprian bishop of Carthage, Dionysius surnamed the Great, bishop of Alexandria, Gregory bishop of Neocaesarta, Victorinus, Arnobius and Lactantius. 3. The act of purification by water, in the sprinkling of the face and hands was in use long before the Christian era and very probably gave rise to its adoption for purposes of baptism by the early Christian Church. Holy or consecrated water was used by the pagans to exorcise or drive out devils. Its first use, as a symbol of purity, is undoubtedly very ancient. Whether or not the custom was of pagan origin cannot be determined.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CANADA'S NEW GOVERNOR.

THE announcement is made by cable that a new Governor-General of Canada has been appointed. Lord Stanley, who now holds the position, succeeds to the title and estates of his brother, the Earl of Derby, who died recently, and it is necessary that he should return home to attend to his family duties. Mr. Gladstone has selected as his successor in the high office, John Campbell Hamilton Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen, whose portrait appears on this page. The Earl is forty-six years of age and has for several years held a distinguished position in religious and philanthropic as well as in political circles. He succeeded to the Earldom in 1870, on the death of his elder brother. He was at that time a Conservative in politics, but in 1878 he disapproved of the action of Lord Beaconsfield in espousing the cause of Turkey and risking war with Russia. He with several other prominent statesmen severed his connection with the party and subsequently joined the Liberal party. He has given his attention both in and out of Parliament less to party measures than to social subjects. When a Royal Commission was appointed to collect evidence and suggest legislation for the prevention of railroad accidents, Lord Aberdeen was made chairman of it, and he also did efficient work as a member of the Committee on Intemperance. He was also appointed High Commissioner of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and held the office for four years. He came, however, most prominently before the public as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, a thankless office, which usually covers its occupant with opprobrium. Lord Aberdeen, however, was an exception to the rule; he and his wife were cordially liked by the Irish, and when he quitted office at the downfall of the Gladstone administration, they overwhelmed him with their testimonies of affection. No greater proof of a man's tact and geniality could be produced. During the Conservative supremacy, the Earl has of course been out of office, but he has led a busy life in connection with the many religious and philanthropic societies with which he is associated. He has been much concerned at the privations and hardships of the unemployed in London, and when Gen. Booth of the Salvation Army, organized his scheme of relief, Lord Aberdeen gave him five thousand dollars toward the expenses. Canada is to be congratulated on having at the head of her government a man so worthy and so sympathetic with all efforts for the benefit of the people. That qualification is set down in the Bible as of greater value than statesmanship. (Prov. 31: 9.)

Immigrants Mixed.

THE immigration inspectors at New York tried the new law on May 10th, and it was evident from their weary, jaded appearance when their work was finished that the law had tried them. The Majestic of the White Star line brought 967 immigrants and other vessels brought large numbers, making a total of four thousand persons to be examined. Each immigrant was required to answer nineteen questions, and in order to facilitate the examiners the law requires the steamship companies to put the questions to immigrants before departure or during the voyage. They are also required to group them according to their answers and supply them with labels corresponding with a manifest sheet. When this system is carried out, the examiners in New York can pass entire groups at once, without questioning them individually. They will only have to see that the immigrants of a group correspond to the entries on the manifest. The steamship companies last week appeared to have failed to understand what was required of them and in some cases no grouping had been done, while in others the groups were mixed. The immigrants had grouped themselves according to congeniality of disposition, or according to friendships formed on the voyage. As a party entered one of the eight narrow lanes leading past the examiners' desks it would be found that the twenty or thirty persons, who should have formed one group, represented almost as many groups as there were persons, and the long string of questions had to be put to each person. It took seven hours' hard work to get throught the entire crowd. A similar mistake is made by society in grouping the travellers on the voyage of life. We group them according as they are rich or poor, ignorant or educated; but at the end of the voyage we shall find that our distinctions have been superficial. Social ties and class distinctions will be removed; and men, "being let go, will go to their own company." (Acts 4: 23.)

A Whale's Attack on a Schooner.

A FIRM of shipowners at Victoria, B. C., received notice last week from Japan that one of their vessels, the schooner Mermaid was obliged to go into dock at Yokohama for repairs. She had received severe injuries in a conflict with a whale. It appears that while off the coast of Japan three weeks ago, the man at the wheel sighted an enormous whale, lying apparently asleep, in the schooner's course. He called the captain, who ordered the ship's course changed so as to avoid the big fish. The monster, however, was soon seen to be moving and it came directly toward the schooner. It came rapidly as if in rage, lashing its terrible tail. The sailors were afraid of it and tried to steer the vessel away from it, but the whale also changed its course, and made a dart at the bow. Its huge tail struck the stem of the vessel with a crash which stove in the upper part, and carried away a portion of the rigging. The sailors expected the whale to return and finish the destruction of the ship, but, to their surprise, it dived and disappeared. The reason for its retreat was explained when the vessel reached the dock at Yokohama, where she went to repair the damage. The jagged ends of her broken timbers were coated with great pieces of the whale's flesh, showing that the blow must have injured the whale as much as it had injured the ship. Many a bullying man who, like the whale, has sought a conflict which his antagonist was trying to avoid, has had a similar experience, and it is always true that he who rebels against God injures himself. (Prov. 11: 17.)

A Marriage on a Bridge.

An unexpected difficulty arose at a marriage ceremony at East St. Louis a few days ago. A large party of friends assembled at the Methodist Church there, to witness the marriage of a popular young lady to a young man of St. Louis. When the time arrived for the ceremony, and the minister was in his place with the couple before him, one of the persons present called his attention to a defect in the license. The bridegroom had procured the document in St. Louis, and it was evident that a Missouri license was useless in Illinois. The wedding would have to be postponed until an Illinois license had been procured, or it must take place across the border. The latter course was chosen. The bridal couple, with the minister and their friends, proceeded to the big Eads Bridge, and took up their places just beyond the State line. There the marriage ceremony was performed. The delay and trouble were vexatious, but they were necessary to make the marriage valid. Probably the bridegroom thought that if he had a license he could be married anywhere at any time. It was a mistake. The marriage will be recognized as valid in Illinois, or wherever the young people may go, but it had to take place in the State in which the license was granted. It is important that everyone should realize that an analogous provision applies to union with Christ. It will be recognized in heaven, but it must take place on earth, where alone the privilege of becoming united to him by a living faith is open to all men (Matt. 10: 32.)

The Emperor and the Reichstag.

A SPEECH which has set all Europe wondering and talking was made on May 9, by the Emperor of Germany, to the officers of his Guards on the Tempelhofer Feld. It referred to the Army Bill which was recently rejected by the Reichstag. After expressing the sorrow and disappointment with which he had seen "men indifferent to the welfare of their country" defeat the patriotic party, the Emperor went on to say: "I was obliged to dissolve the Reichstag in the hope that the new Reichstag would pass the bill. I am determined, in case this hope also be disappointed, to stake all in my power to obtain the enactment of the measure, for I am too thoroughly convinced of its necessity as a guarantee of the peace of Europe to allow it to be finally defeated." The Emperor spoke slowly, pausing slightly after every sentence, and emphasized all significant words, as if to attract attention to the seriousness of the situation and the firmness of his resolution to win. The officers listened in silence to what must have seemed to them like the pronouncement of a dictator. Similar utterances may have fallen from the lips of such despots as Commodus, who militarized the Roman Empire with his Prætorian Guards, Severus, who enjoined his son, Caracalla, to "enrich the soldiery and despise the people," and who was justly accounted as the author of the Empire's ruin; or of Napoleon I., whose incessant drafts on the manhood of France for war purposes, left it a ruined and helpless nation. Their careers illustrated the falseness of that logic which asserts that national armament to the point of military enslavement, is the best means of securing national peace and prosperity. It would be well for Germany if the Emperor heeded the warning of the Psalmist, "There is no king saved by the multitude of a host." (Psa. 33: 16.)

How He Saved his Child.

A LITTLE girl five years old, the daughter of a physician at Sag Harbor, L. I., had an experience on May 10, which neither she nor her parents will ever forget. She had a fondness for the taste of citrate of magnesia and while playing about the house she found one of the dark blue bottles which she recognized as the kind from which she had often been allowed to take little tastes. This bottle, however, had been used by some careless person to hold oxalic acid. The child knowing nothing of the difference in its contents raised the bottle to her lips and drank enough to kill two persons. The pungent fluid burned the little mouth and throat cruelly. She dropped the bottle and called for "mamma." Her father heard her cry and ran to her. A glance at his pet holding her throat with both hands, and at the broken bottle, the contents of which were eating into carpet and floor, explained the trouble to the physician. There was not an instant to lose. Pulling his knife from his pocket, the quick-witted doctor sprang to the whitewashed wall and scraped a quantity of the plaster into his hand. This he threw into a glass of water and made the agonized child drink it. Almost instantly the little throat grew better. The sharp cutting and burning of the acid stopped; it was neutralized by the alkali from the limed wall. The child's life was saved, though it will be some days before the cruel blisters on her mouth and throat are healed. But for her father's knowledge and presence of mind she would probably have died. It was unlikely that anyone but a skilful physician would have known that an antidote was so near at hand. As it is, she has suffered torture through someone's inexcusable carelessness in putting poison into the magnesia bottle. Spiritual poison is in these days often unwittingly taken through similar means. Unsuspecting people accustomed to accept without question the teaching of the pulpit and professedly Christian books, are liable to be deceived, and unhappily, there is not always someone at hand who can administer the proper antidote by prayer and faith. (1. John 4: 1.)

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN,
The New Governor-General of Canada.

To Generate its Own Light.

A NOVEL invention for lighting railroad cars was tested at Newark, N. J., on April 19. A car which was fitted up with incandescent electric lamps was attached to a train. At the rear of the car was a closet in which an electric generator was placed, and this by an ingenious contrivance was so connected with the axles of the car as to obtain an armature speed of twelve hundred revolutions a minute. The generator was in connection with secondary batteries under the car, which fed the twenty incandescent lamps. The experiment was a complete success. It needs now, only the perfection of the storage arrangements, which will keep the lamps alight in the interval between the stopping and the starting of the car. So long as the car is running, the same power that gives it motion, gives it light. The economy of the device will probably soon bring it into general use. It has long been known that an analogous principle operated in the spiritual world. Those of God's children who were most active in his service have always been those who have enjoyed the most spiritual light; and both light and power have come from the same divine Source. Christ's promise is fulfilled: "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness but shall have the light of life." (John 8: 12.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Dean William Lawrence has written to Rev. William H. Brooks, D.D., accepting the Bishopric of Massachusetts to which he was elected in succession to the late Rt. Rev. Phillips Brooks.

At the last annual meeting of the American Sunday-School Union, the annual report showed that 1546 new schools have been organized and 404 revived. This makes the total 7,216 schools.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, formerly of Philadelphia, has commenced revival services at Eau Claire, Wis. Two meetings are held each day. Rev. W. N. Sloan, of the First Presbyterian Church, and Rev. D. C. Jones, of the Second Church, with the other pastors, are working heartily with the evangelist. The meetings are interesting and promise great good to all in attendance.

Evangelist E. P. Telford has been holding revival services in Dudley Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., of which Rev. A. S. Gumbart is pastor. The church has a wonderful record as a strong, active church, and Mr. Telford's services were heartily appreciated. The Evangelist went thence to Lowell, Mass., where he is holding services in Rev. Hugh Montgomery's M. E. Church.

The national Temperance Society held its twenty-eighth annual meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, last week. Mr. John Wanamaker was elected President for the ensuing year. The speakers congratulated the Society on the vast amount of good it has accomplished. Dr. J. M. Buckley made a strong protest against the theory that drunkenness was a disease. He said that it was a fact that the so-called "Gold Cure" had resulted in many instances in relapse and in others in insanity.

At the seventy-seventh annual meeting of the American Bible Society held in New York it was stated that the disbursements for the past year amounted to $536,537. The total receipts from all sources were $578,930. It was announced that the Society was making an exhibit at the World's Fair of the Bibles and Bible portions printed in 242 languages and dialects which it prints in the Bible House. A souvenir pamphlet has also been issued containing the verse John 3: 16, in each of these languages.

The many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have sent contributions to the shelter for fallen women in Mulberry street, New York, described in our issue of April 12, will be glad to learn that through remarkable providential circumstances, a large house has been secured in Varick place, for the shelter. It is in every way suitable for the work, and the owner, who heartily sympathizes with the object of the mission, has made liberal concessions in the rental. Mr. J. L. Spicer, of the American Sunday School Union, Bible House, New York, has charge of the finances, and will be glad to receive contributions toward the expenses.

Dr. L. W. Munhall announces that the Sixth Annual Inter-Denominational Bible Conference will be held at Asbury Park, N. J., Aug. 11–21. As many of our readers attended the former Conferences, and derived great benefit from them, this early intimation is given so that they can make arrangements for attending this, which promises to surpass all its predecessors in interest and helpfulness. Among the speakers who have promised to take part in the proceedings are Dr. William H. Green, of Princeton; Dr. William G. Moorhead, of Xenia, Ohio.; Dr. Talbot W. Chambers, of New York, and Dr. James H. Brookes, of St. Louis. A summer school for Bible Study will also be held during the Conference, under the charge of Dr. William J. Erdman, and other eminent Bible scholars.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

PENTECOST FULLY COME.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, May 21, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

"And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting," etc. Acts 2: 1-4.

E to-day celebrate with appropriate services what is known in some churches as Whitsunday. It is well known that this name refers to the white garments worn by candidates for baptism, or worn by those who had been recently baptized. It is a festival of the Church in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. Although not observed very early in the Church, it came to be one of the most prominent of all the sacred feasts. In the early Church the entire period from Easter to Pentecost was observed as a joyous occasion. It was a time of thanksgiving, because of the exaltation of Christ to the right hand of God. In some portions of the Church this period was considered as a continuous Sunday. It was also marked by an absence of all fasting and of kneeling at all the public prayers. It was considered a time of holy jubilation. But, unfortunately, after a time, it degenerated into mere merrymaking. As marking the descent of the Holy Spirit and the season appeals to our loyalty and is deemed one of chief importance and worthy of an honored emphasis. For long periods it was the chosen time for the observance of baptism and for the giving of ordination to the candidates for the Christian ministry. It is fitting that an occasion so honored of God, and so influential in its relations to the Church, should receive our consideration even now.

We must not allow ourselves to suppose that the Holy Spirit was not in the world until this Pentecost. From the very beginning of creation the Spirit was active both in the creation of the universe and in the re-creation of men. But when Pentecost was fully come the Spirit came with greater fullness of life than ever before. He has dwelt in the church ever since. This is, in a special sense, the dispensation of the Holy Ghost. Christ promised to send another comforter, as one of his ascension gifts. The work of God the Father was especially marked previous to the incarnation of the Son. The work of God the Son continues now at the right hand of God since his ascension and enthronement, and the work of God the Spirit, on the day of Pentecost, marked a new era in the divine manifestation and economy. There is in the divine plan a fulness of time for the manifestation of each person in the blessed Trinity.

The day of Pentecost is the beginning of the second period in the New Testament dispensation. We speak of Christmas as the birthday of the Lord; we must speak of Pentecost as the birthday of his church. As the birthday of Christ was proclaimed by angelic voices chanting his praises, so the birthday of the church was proclaimed by human voices chanting his praises in the various tongues of earth. Christmas marked the incarnation of the Son;

The Incarnation of the Spirit.

Ever since believers have been his temple. Under the dispenation of the Spirit the mind of God entered into a new relationship with the time until God the Son shall return in his great glory and heavenly splendor to call his

In the study of this subject it is well for us, in the first place, to emphasize the time of the Spirit's coming. We have every reason to believe that the Spirit came on the first day of the week. Honor was thus for the second time done to this day. Not only did it mark the resurrection of our Lord but also his enthronement at the right hand of the Father. The first day of the week is, therefore, a standing memorial of the resurrection of Christ and of the descent of the Spirit. These two considerations give additional dignity and glory to it as the Lord's day. We have not given the day sufficient honor as a memorial of the coming of the Spirit. Whitsunday as well as Easter-day should stimulate the gratitude and evoke the praises of all God's devout children. As the one day commemorates Christ's birth from the tomb, so the other commemorates the birth of the church, and marks an era in the history of redemption. If Christian people would observe the Lord's day with reference to these two great truths the day would have increased dignity, solemnity and tenderness in their thoughts. We honor it as the time of the birth of the church, which next to the birth and resurrection of Christ is the greatest event in the history of our race.

At a Prayer-Meeting.

The spirit came also when God's children were met for prayer. This circumstance also is worthy of an emphasis which it seldom receives. It is true that some have reckoned so as to make this Pentecost fall on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. But all the Christian traditions point to Sunday as the day and all the Christian observances of the day, as far back as they can be traced, lead to the same conclusion. When we turn to the fourteenth verse of the preceding chapter we see that all who are named were with one accord in prayer and supplication, Mary the mother of Jesus being one of the number. On some former occasions there had been jealousies and envyings among the disciples; but these are now entirely gone. There are now no schisms, no opposing interests, no discordant ambitions. There is here a beautiful picture of earnest devotion and of united supplication. Mary the mother of Jesus has cast in her lot with the apostles and is also a supplicant at the feet of her divine Son and Lord. We have here one of the finest examples of earnest prayer which the Word of God anywhere gives us. The disciples had followed their Master to the eastern declivity of the Mount of Olives. While the words "to the uttermost part of the earth" are on his lips he is parted from them. They steadily watch him as with uplifted hands he pronounces his blessing, and then they see him moving sublimely upward, all the laws of gravitation submitting to his higher authority. The everlasting doors lift up their heads and the King of glory triumphantly enters. Within the veil he receives the worship which is his due, and on the earth his disciples lift up their prayers and praises in his name. This was even for the disciples. They now understand what he meant when he said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you." During the forty days he spent upon the earth he opened to them the Scriptures; they now saw as never before what his death meant, and that there was to be no more temple and no more altar. Perhaps they expected that the Spirit would come almost immediately upon the Lord's departure; but day after day passes until a week is gone. "Not many days," said the Master, and so they wait and pray and pray and wait.

Never had such prayers ascended from earth to heaven as these. Eight days are gone: ten days are gone! Is the promise to be broken? What did Christ mean when he said, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high?" But God's children never wait and never pray in vain. The promise is near the fulfilment; the day of Pentecost is dawning; the longing of their hearts will be fully met. There is some work for them during the interval of ten days between the ascension of Christ and the effusion of the Spirit. An apostle is to be elected in the room of Judas who had fallen. This work done, they continue to wait for the Spirit as they who wait for the morning. They are sure of his coming, but they will not relax their earnest prayers and will not cease their continuous waiting. Persevering prayer and unity of purpose are divinely appointed means for opening the heavens. Through the cloud, which shut out the ascending Lord from the strained eyes of the disciples, the incense of prayer may rise and the dews of blessing may fall. Thus they wait and thus they pray.

The chief note of time, however, for the coming of the Spirit is that the day of Pentecost was fully come. We know that the word Pentecost literally means the fiftieth of something; but the Greek adjective finally came to be used as a substantive and is so used in this connection. It was applied to the festival which occurred fifty days after the Passover. We know that this feast was also called "the feast of weeks," and "the feast of harvest, or first fruits." Nothing could be more important than that the Spirit should descend on the occasion of

The Historic Feast.

According to the Jewish tradition, as we learn from Maimonides, this feast commemorated the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, which event occurred on the fiftieth day after the departure of Israel from Egypt. It was the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, and was believed to be the very day on which the law was given on Mount Sinai. Pentecost was one of the three yearly feasts prescribed in the Mosaic law. The selection of these three periods was not arbitrary, but in strict harmony with national events and with natural events and with the changing seasons. Nothing could be more beautiful than the connection between the descent of the Spirit and the crucifixion of Christ on the one hand, and the relation between the feast of the Passover and the feast of Pentecost on the other hand. Fifty days after the paschal lamb was slain God came in fire and flame on Mount Sinai inaugurating a new dispensation, and fifty days after the true Paschal Lamb was slain God came again in fire and flame and inaugurated the dispensation of the Spirit. It is impossible to fail to see the connection between these symbolic events of the olden time and the deeply spiritual experiences of these apostolic days. At the first Pentecost the law was given on tables of stone; at the last Pentecost the Spirit came to write that law on the hearts of the disciples.

Visible and Audible.

Let us observe, in the second place, the manner of the Spirit's coming. It was to be expected that so great an event as the inauguration of a new spiritual dispensation, that so sublime an occurrence as the special manifestation of the third Person in the Trinity should be preceded and accompanied by sensible and audible phenomena. We are not, therefore, surprised to know that "suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting." This was an extraordinary sound. It came suddenly; it came from heaven. This expression intimates that it was not the result of any natural influence; it may suggest also the origin of the sound, that it descended as if from God. It is to be observed that this was not a rushing mighty wind, but simply that it gave forth a sound that could best be represented by this description. There seems to have been no gale sweeping over the city, no wind that violently struck the sides of the building or that swept furiously through the street. The sound fell directly downward without cause, or presence or movement to explain its existence. It came like mighty showers in a dead calm and from a cloudless sky. God was pleased to give two witnesses to the descent of the Spirit, one appealing to the sense of hearing, this strange sound; the other appealing to the sense of sight, the tongues of flame. We stand in awe of this mysterious sound. Whence came it? What means it? Is it not

The Lord breathing upon His People?

Was not this a supernatural sign of the divine presence? Was not this invisible witness mightily testifying to the presence of the Holy Ghost? Was not this sound emblematic of the mighty power of the divine Spirit? May we not well imagine that the head of each disciple bowed reverently as this strange sound was heard? Who among them could resist the conviction that the mighty Spirit of the living God was breathed upon them in fulness of blessing and in the majesty of God himself?

We are not surprised to learn that this sound filled all the place where they were sitting. We are to refer this expression to the sound rather than to the wind, for it is not even affirmed that there was any wind blowing. Far more terrific than a tempest was this windless sound. A sound of wind when no wind was blowing might well fill every soul with holy awe. We are to believe that they were meeting in a private dwelling rather than in any part of the temple. This sound was symbolic of the presence of the all-pervading Spirit. Cyril of Jerusalem has said, "For as he who sinks down into the waters and is baptized and is surrounded on all sides by the waters, so also they were completely baptized by Spirit." O mysterious and blessed baptism! Now the disciples were receiving the divine enduement of power for which they were to tarry in Jerusalem. Now they will go forth with irresistible power to declare the story of redeeming love. Only as men are endued with power from on high can they so declare the glorious Gospel that Christ shall be honored and souls shall be redeemed.

The Cloven Tongues.

The visible sign of the Spirit's presence was "cloven tongues like as of fire." The word translated cloven is more correctly rendered by the word "distributed." Painters have represented these tongues as divided into two or more portions; the form of the Pope's cap was derived from an incorrect interpretation of this passage. The tongues were not themselves cloven, but each tongue was separated from a mass of seeming flame. Flames naturally assume the form of tongues, and so we have the expression, common in many literatures, "a lambent flame." These tongues were not of fire, but were "like as of fire." They possessed the brightness without the burning of fire. One of the tongues sat on each of those present. We know that fire has ever been regarded as a striking emblem of deity. Thus God is said to have revealed himself to Moses in the bush which burned, but was not consumed; thus on Mount Sinai God descended in the midst of thunder, lightning, smoke and fire, striking emblems of his presence and power; thus startlingly in the Old Testament, and in the New God is described as

A "Consuming Fire."

We are familiar also with the fact that the most famous classic writers frequently represent their deities by fire and flame in various forms. It was especially fitting that the Holy Spirit should be so represented. The prediction of John the Baptist was, "He shall baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire." The purity and the purifying power of the Spirit were thus strikingly set forth.

We cannot, however, fail to observe the special form of this flame. It might naturally assume the form of a tongue; and frequently in the Bible we read of "the tongue of fire" suggesting the thin, long, narrow point which flames naturally assume. But in this instance we are warranted in seeing a degree of significance in the tongue-like form of the flame. Not a shapeless flame is here presented to our view, not Abraham's lamp, nor the coal of Isaiah, but a tongue comes before us. Over the head of each one of that honored group rests a tongue of flame. There is a sense in which the tongue was to be the symbol of the dispensation now inaugurated. Any form of fire would have suggested the presence of God, but its particular form taught an additional truth. Well has William Arthur said, "Christianity was to be a Tongue of Fire." Not by the printed page, mighty as it may be for good and for God, but by the living voice of the living preacher is the glorious gospel to be proclaimed.

A Tongue Set on Fire of the Holy Ghost is a power neither man nor devils can resist. The tongue, when consecrated to God, is the mightiest and most glorious instrument for good which the world has ever known. It is the power which has confounded enemies, which has confronted learned councils, and which has silenced opposing hosts of every kind; this is the power which is to-day girdling the world with the blessed story of redeeming love. Oh, that the Lord God Almighty would consecrate to his service by the touch of his mighty love the tongue of eloquence in every language and country!

We are also called upon, in the third place, to notice the results of the Spirit's coming so far as set forth in the text. Those who were present—and the number is certainly not limited to the apostles, nor perhaps to the one hundred and twenty—"were all filled with the Holy Ghost." Up to this time the Spirit had come to men in smaller measures, had come simply as foretastes of this larger blessing. Now the children of God were entirely under the influence and power of the Spirit of God. To be filled with anything is a Scriptural phrase implying that all the faculties are prevaded by it, or are under its control. Our attention was previously called to the external evidences of the divine presence, but now to the internal. The Spirit was now present in fulness. He pervaded the whole being of those upon whom he came. He imparted to them extraordinary powers of many kinds. Under the old dispensation he was given only to chosen leaders or to skilled workmen, or to such honored servants as Elizabeth, Zacharias and John the Baptist. There were special and transient occasions on which we hear of persons being filled with the Holy Ghost. Now he is to be in God's people. His abiding presence is their joyful privilege. Previous to this the apostles had enjoyed only the ordinary influence of the Spirit, but now his indwelling in the largest measure. Now God's Spirit is put into all his people. In the early day the Spirit of God strove with men both before and after the flood, but it was only when the Son of God came to earth that the Spirit of God returned to the earth in fulness In the second Adam he dwelt without measure, and now he sends down the Spirit to dwell in this larger form with the disciples whom he left upon the earth. As vessels they were long prepared for this infilling, and when the Spirit came on the day of Pentecost these prepared vessels were filled to overflowing.

We read also that they "began to speak with other tongues." How can we explain so wonderful an event? There have been many attempts made to deny or to modify this miracle. Some have said that the miracle was not in the speaking of the apostles but in the hearing of the people; but this cannot be, as the use of the tongues was manifested before the hearers were met together. Nothing can be more certain from what follows than that these disciples actually spoke with other tongues. We know that they did not merely speak in different dialects of the Greek language, for the people were met from many lands and were of many tongues. We here see that the disaster of Babel was more than remedied by the blessings of Pentecost. Sin separated man from God and man from man. Salvation comes to unite men to one another and all men to God. Pentecost is

The Divine Remedy for Babel.

The native tongue of many of the people was the barbarous dialect of Galilee. Some, indeed, were acquainted with Greek and Latin; but there is no reason to think that any were acquainted with the divers languages represented on this occasion. The natural meaning of the passage is that these disciples were endowed by the power of the Holy Ghost to speak the foreign languages. This ability was predicted in the Old Testament; it was also promised by the Lord Jesus when he commissioned his disciples. It was vastly important on this occasion that the Gospel should be proclaimed in the languages of those present at this feast. We do not, however, suppose that the disciples used this miraculous gift in their ordinary work. The Greek tongue was so general throughout the Roman Empire that they could ordinarily use it in their preaching; but the ability to speak in various languages ministered marvelously to the rapid spread of the Gospel at the Pentecostal feast. The ability to speak in these varied tongues on this occasion carried the Gospel to more people than could have been reached by the ordinary ministrations of the Word for a series of years. Pentecost was a great hilltop, and kindling the light thereon it shone out across many lands and for the illumination of many peoples. It is glorious that these first disciples were thus able to speak as the Spirit gave them utterance, glorious that each man could hear the Gospel in the language in which he was born. It is still the duty of the Church to give the Gospel to all peoples not only in the tongues of the learned, but in the language of daily speech and of the common people.

America's Opportunity.

The churches in America have special opportunities and obligations resting upon them now in connection with the Columbian Exposition. Here will be met representatives from every land under heaven. These men come to study American institutions and to learn the secret of America's greatness. We need to be endued with power from on high to declare the Gospel to these assembled nations. We need to hold up before Mohammedan and Buddhist, before Brahmin and Confucianist, Jesus Christ as the perfect One, as the desire of all nations, and as the one hope of this fallen world. We need men over whose heads rests the tongue of fire, men whose hearts are aglow with love to God, men whose lips have been touched by a coal from the divine altar. All our churches need this divine enduement. Oh, for the Pentecostal baptism! Oh, for the tongue of fire! Oh, for the prayer which pierces the clouds and which brings these blessings! God in heaven, make this year of 1893, in this America of ours, the Pentecostal birthday of a new era in the church of God, the culmination of the hopes of the past and the prophecy of a still more blessed Pentecost as the twentieth century dawns!

THE ARMOR OF GOD.

YOUNG Soldier of the Cross, beware!
A watchful foe besets thy way,
His bow is ready bent to slay
The soul unarmed and bare—
Gird on thine armor for the fight,
Close on the left hand and the right.

Let truth's pure girdle belt thee round,
Let Christ's own righteousness complete
Protect thy breast—and be thy feet
With Gospel fitness bound;
Thy shield be Faith's own changing light,
Salvation's hope thy helmet bright.

Grasp in thy hand that potent sword
In heaven's high armory prepared,
Quick to attack, and strong to guard,
The weapon of God's word;
Then, strong in prayer, pursue thy way,
Nor foe shall crush nor arrow slay!

CHRIST, THE GUIDE AND COUNSELLOR.

JESUS, my truth, my way,
My sure unerring light,
On thee my feeble step I stay,
Which thou wilt guide aright.

My wisdom and my guide,
My counsellor thou art;
O never may I leave thy side,
Or from thy path depart.

I lift mine eye to thee.
Thou gracious, bleeding Lamb,
That I may now enlightened be,
And never put to shame.

O make me like to thee,
Before I hence remove;
Settle, confirm and 'stablish me,
And build me up in love.

—HENRY HEAP.

UNDER THE SHADOW.

JESUS my Lord! to thee I come,
To thy dear arms, if yet there's room,
For one so vile as I,
To thy bright robe oh let me cling,
To hide beneath thy sheltering wing,
For safety would I fly.

I cast myself beneath thy Cross;
Now take away my sin and dross,
And fill my soul with peace;
Oh! take me by thy loving hand,
And lead me to that blissful land,
Where pleasures never cease.

Come, quicken now, my power to love,
Set my best hopes on things above,
Help me to love thee true,
Help me adore thy holy name,
To spread abroad thy matchless fame
And yield thee all thy due.

Signs to Precede the Advent.

Notes of an address on the Impending Reconstruction of the Roman Empire.

BY REV. A. J. STEED.

THERE are certain conspicuous events which are to take place in this world preceding the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one thing is the organization of a Ten-kingdomed Confederacy within the boundaries of Cæsar's original Roman Empire. There are 23 kingdoms now, but before the Lord comes the Bible clearly teaches us that these 23 kingdoms are to be changed into ten kingdoms. In Daniel 2: 31, we read that Nebuchadnezzar saw a great metallic image, whose head was of fine gold, his breast and arms of silver, the thighs of brass, the legs of iron, the feet part of iron and part of clay. Daniel said the interpretation of this image was that Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom should be followed by three kingdoms and the last kingdom should be divided into ten divisions as represented by the ten toes of the image. These kingdoms have existed, the Babylonian kingdom was the head; Medo-Persian, the arms and shoulders; Grecian, the loins; Roman, the legs; and they are a faithful representation of the Roman Empire as it was divided into western and eastern divisions, which were afterwards sub-divided into 23 kingdoms, but we have not had the ten kingdoms yet. We are looking for them and for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, for in the days of these ten kingdoms (Dan. 2: 44), God will set up a kingdom that will never be destroyed, an everlasting kingdom.

Another great thing to precede Christ's Advent is the embryo rise of a terrible monster, called in the Bible, Antichrist, the Wicked One, the Man of Sin, and the Son of Perdition; one, who will exalt himself and set himself against everything, even God himself. Now, this Antichrist will arise after the formation of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy, as we are told very plainly in Daniel 7: 24, and 8: 9. There Antichrist comes forward as a Little Horn, out of one of the four kingdoms into which Alexander the Great's kingdom was divided after his death. Antichrist is to become King of Syria: I daresay he will be a very pleasant man to talk to: there will be something very fascinating in his manner. He will get the kingdom by flattery; he shall come in a subtle way, according to Daniel 11: 21. He will work the thing so as to attain his object. He will give the Jews religious liberty, and allow them to worship God with sacrifices in a rebuilt temple, concerning which he will, according to Daniel 9: 27, make a seven years' covenant with them. But in the midst of the seven years the ten kingdoms will give him all their power, and then he will give up his pleasing ways, and will be seen to be the terrible creature that the Bible represents him to be, and then he will commence to persecute the Christians. He will go so far as to have his image set up in the temple at Jerusalem, and he will decree a number, 666, to be known as his imperial stamp, and all who will not have this number placed on their foreheads or hands, will be put to death.

Before the first stage of Christ's Advent in the air, this confederacy must be formed, as one of the signs of the Lord's second coming. I don't think we shall have to wait long for it. Before long some gigantic European war will break out and produce this ten-kingdomed confederacy. After this happens, the Lord will speedily come.

There are many reasons for believing that this advent of our Lord is very near. One is that as Daniel "understood by books the number of the years" (Dan. 9:2), and perceived that the end of the Jewish captivity was approaching, so in our day learned men have "understood by books" notably from Daniel's own book that the end of this dispensation is approaching. You are familiar with these calculations which seem to me as clear and cogent as a proposition in Euclid. Then there are other signs, which are marvellously like those of which our Lord said, "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." (Matt. 24: 33). There is that emissary from hell, called spiritualism, which is surely a sign that we are living in the last days. St. Paul says, "Men shall depart from the faith, giving heed to the doctrines of demons." Look at the upside-down state of the world. The spirit of discontent reigns on all sides. Agitation exists on every hand. Capital against labor, and the employed against employers. Look at the constantly recurring earthquakes. Look at the confusion in which the world is; it is in such a disquieted state that no government can put things right—neither kings nor congresses nor parliaments can reform it. It needs the King to come; and not until Jesus Christ comes will things be as they should be.

THE APOSTLE OF THE COMMUNE.

The Death of Rev. R. W. McAll, Who for More than Twenty Years Preached Christ to the Anarchists of Paris.

ALL Christendom joins in the mourning of the immediate friends of the valiant and devoted servant of Christ, who was called from earth on May 11. The Rev. R. W. McAll quietly and unostentatiously began and carried forward a work which has made his name famous in every land where Christ is preached. It was a work of extraordinary difficulty, and one which only a man of unbounded faith in the power of Christ to save and keep, would have taken up. It began in 1870, when the whole world was ringing with indignation against the desperadoes who had slain the Archbishop of Paris, and had defaced and destroyed monuments and works of art of priceless value. "Let them stew in their own gravy," had been Bismarck's expressive order, and truly it seemed that no worse punishment could be devised than that of leaving them to their own way. The Republic, when it asserted its authority and the majesty of the law, had no remedy for them but the bullet and the manacle. But when Mr. McAll saw the savage, desperate men, whose natures seemed more demoniacal than human, his soul went out to them in pity. "God loves you; I love you," were the simple words he uttered in his broken French. The fierce faces changed their expression of brutal hate, as the unexpected words fell on their ears. Such words they had never heard before, and many of them had never heard the name of God at all, except in imprecation. The good man stayed among them for a few months, and they soon learned that his love for them was no mere phrase, but an active principle. Months stretched to years, and, one after another, rooms were opened, in which the message of the love of God for the poor and the lost and the despairing was proclaimed to attentive ears. Mr. McAll and his wife took no money for their work. They had a small income, which sufficed for their modest requirements, and they gave themselves freely to the work. Friends in England and America, who heard of his effort, supplied funds to pay the rent of the rooms in which the Gospel was preached, and so, from year to year the movement lived and spread, until last year the ceaseless activity of Mr. McAll's life seemed to have made no inroads on his vitality, but last fall it was noticed that he was breaking down. He was persuaded to go to his native place for a brief rest. Last month, however, he could bear his separation from his beloved work no longer, and he appeared again among his friends in Paris. It was a last effort; it was evident that the end was near. A few days later, his devoted spirit which had sustained him for more than twenty years of arduous labor was summoned home, and thousands of God's children feel themselves bereft.

ASSAM COMING TO CHRIST.

THE Welsh mission to the Khasi Hills in Assam has recently been visited by a medical missionary, Dr. Macphail, who labors among the Santhals. His report of this out-of-the-world quarter may come as a glad surprise even to the diligent student of missions. The mission field is now so wide, and so rich in information, that it seems impossible to keep in touch with all that is going on. He writes: "They are an enterprising, industrious and well-educated people; once among the most troublesome of the hill tribes, they are now the most prosperous. Out of a population of [illegible] there is every probability that in a few years the whole country will be Christian. Their [illegible] mission church I have seen in India. It holds [illegible] well filled."

VOW AND PAY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 4. Eccles. 5: 4; Colos. 3: 22, 24.

IF the form in which the topic appears is intended as an injunction, the meaning of the word "vow" needs to be clearly understood. Webster defines the act as giving, consecrating or dedicating to God by a solemn promise. This is clearly the Christian's duty as to his strength, his labor, himself and his life. Conscious that God has redeemed him from the world and his lower nature, and has imparted the Holy Spirit to him to sanctify him and develop his spiritual nature so that he may be fit for a higher state, he does right to dedicate himself to Christ's service resolving to be and do through all his life what Christ would have him be and do. He is no longer his own, but Christ's, a being consecrated to God. Like the vows uttered at the marriage altar, this vow changes the whole life, imposes new duties and obligations and implants new motives of thought and action. Vows as to the consecration of income and property are a part of this duty. Few Christians know how much or rather how little they give to God. Spasmodic giving is necessarily unsatisfactory. A definite proportion of every Christian's income should be set aside and that proportion should be settled in advance and as honorably paid as a debt to a human creditor. It is the Lord's money and should never be applied to any other purpose. In all these particulars the Christian naturally and rightly in assuming the name of Christian takes upon himself the vows of citizenship in the kingdom of Christ. They should not be assumed lightly or hastily but with clear knowledge remembering that it is better not to vow than to vow and not pay.

The word "vow" is, however, more frequently used in another sense. A man in peril of his life, a parent whose child is sick, a business man over whom heavy losses are impending, will sometimes make a solemn vow that if God will avert the evil he is dreading, he will do something or give something. The act shows a misapprehension of the character of God. The idea of offering God a bargain is repugnant to any man of sense, when it is seen in its true light. If adversity, present or prospective, is recognized as chastisement or discipline, the first duty is amendment and that amendment ought to be a matter of conscientious performance, not contingent on the trouble being removed. God is not a Being to be bribed to a course of action. "Thy will be done," is the Christian's proper prayer. He may ask for what he needs and wishes, but his duty remains the same whether his prayer is granted or not. Sometimes the vows offered in these circumstances are extremely childish and foolish, as was the case in Jephthah's life. (Judges 11). Many a man is in the ministry to-day who has neither the spirit nor the talents suitable for the work, and who would never have been there if his parents had not dedicated him in his infancy to the occupation. Many other examples of foolish vows will occur to every one. Not infrequently the keeping of such vows involves a wrong to the person making the vow and to others. In all such cases, it cannot be supposed that God will be pleased with the fulfilment of the vow and however solemnly they may have been made, they are better broken than kept.

THE NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING AT GERMANTOWN, PA.

A PROSPEROUS Y. M. C. A.

OUR friends of the Young Men's Christian Association of Germantown, Pa., celebrated their twenty-second anniversary on May 9, under peculiarly agreeable circumstances. It was the first anniversary in their new and handsome home. They are proud of the edifice as they have just reason to be. It ranks tenth in size of all the Y. M. C. A. buildings in the United States and its excellent taste and novel arrangements make it a model likely to be extensively copied. Its front is of Pompeiian brick, faced with Indiana limestone and relieved a short distance above the pavement by two courses of dark porcelain brick. The main entrance is one of the most striking features of the building. It is a low, wide arch set on dwarf columns. This admits to a beautifully tiled vestibule sixteen feet wide and twelve feet high, from which rises a graceful staircase in quartered oak to the second floor, where the chief offices are located. On the outside, the front, over the entrance, is set back, so as to leave a wide deep balcony in front of the reading-room on the second floor. Here also are reception, lecture, and amusement-rooms. Above, on the third floor, are the rooms of the Ladies' auxiliary, the managers' offices, the boys' department, and classrooms, which may ultimately become on occasion kitchen and dining-room. The gymnasium is a large, well-equipped room sixty-five feet square on the ground floor in which is a large swimming-bath. The entire cost of the building was nearly $125,000, and the Association and its friends feel that it is well worth all that has been paid for it.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Long Island Chapters held an enthusiastic Convention at Patchogue, on May 11. About five hundred delegates were present. Revs. Edward A. Blake, Chauncey W. Brown, J. B. Morrell, W. P. Ferguson, Sam'l A. Smith, and Presiding Elder C. S. Wing, were among the speakers. Twenty-two chapters reported the organization of Junior Leagues. The question of the reference to amusements in the new pledge evoked a wide difference of opinion and an animated discussion took place at the morning session. The sense of the Convention appeared to be that there should be uniformity in the matter throughout the League and that it should be adopted by all chapters or by none. Mr. W. H. Baker, of East Orange, was elected President for the ensuing year. — The New Jersey Convention at Newark on May 11, elected the following officers for the year: President, Dr. J. C. Clark; Vice-Presidents, Dr. C. Frank Nettleship, J. B. Shaw, Rev. J. R. Mace, and Robert M. Collyer; Corresponding Secretary, Frederick J. Lovatt; Recording Secretary, W. W. Dobbins; Treasurer, Samuel W. Fox.—The League is making rapid progress in Michigan. The Watervliet Chapter has more than doubled its membership since its organization. Its devotional meetings, which are held every Sunday, are well attended, and its bi-weekly business meetings are full of interest. The League at Lincoln Avenue Church, Detroit, is similarly prosperous. Its "convention evenings," devoted to music and the reading of short original papers by the members prove a complete success and are thoroughly enjoyed.

A WARD OF THE ORDER.

A PATHETIC story of the adoption of a child by two circles of King's Daughters and one of King's Sons is told in the Canadian department of the Silver Cross. It appears that the young Christian people of Belleville, Ont,, learned that in the local jail there was a boy seven years old confined there, not for any wrongdoing, but because having no father, mother, or relatives willing to care for him, the jail was a safe place for him. The three circles held a united meeting to take his case into consideration. It naturally occurred to them that a child housed in jail so young and growing up amid such surroundings, had very little hope of becoming a useful man. The Psalmist said that if his father and mother forsook him, the Lord would take him up. The King's Daughters and Sons came to the conclusion that in taking up this friendless child they would be doing the Lord's work. After much correspondence an excellent school was found at which the child could be received and boarded and taught for a hundred and four dollars a year, providing he should remain for nine years. The three circles undertook to provide the funds, but the school required the guarantee of some township, and for a long time no township would undertake the responsibility. Ultimately the city of Belleville was induced to accept the risk on receiving the personal bond of several members of the Order. The boy was taken out of prison and introduced to his new friends. His appearance showed that there was more to be done for him. The child was in rags. The King's Sons supplied garments from their wardrobes, and the King's Daughters became tailoresses and worked with a will until the child was not only well clothed, but had a trunk-full of good garments to take to school with him. Thus equipped he was duly forwarded to the school. His safe arrival was reported. Regular statements of his condition and progress are to be sent to his self-appointed guardians, who are praying that he may grow up a good and useful man.

An encouraging account is to hand of the work of the nine Young Men's Christian Associations that have been established in Russia, and it is stated that two others are in course of formation. There are between six and seven hundred active members, and double the number of associates.

"FALLEN ASLEEP."

WE garner memories rich and rare,
Find wayside flowers, fresh and fair.
We pluck and twine in clustered wreaths,
Where fragrant memory sweetly breathes;
But, ah, too soon these drop and fade
And low by Time's sere frost are laid:—
In cadence solemn, low and deep,
We hear that "Some Have Fallen Asleep."

Asleep till resurrection's sun
Shall tell of a new life begun,
When our frail craft, in turn, shall glide
Down Time's swift stream on flowing tide;
Then may we meet our loved anew,
To part no more with sad adieu;
No more to weary vigils keep,
And mourn that "Some Have Fallen Asleep."

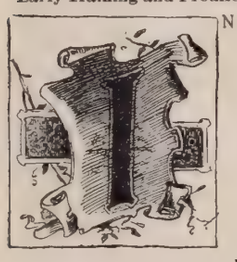
Three Child-Monarchs.

Alexander of Servia, Alfonso of Spain, and Dainty Little Wilhelmina of Holland—Their Early Training and Predilections.



IN civilized countries where the government is a monarchy, when a child succeeds to the throne, the affairs of the nation are usually administered by a Regent. Seldom is a juvenile king or queen heard of in connection with state affairs until the years have arrived when the full powers and responsibilities of the throne can he assumed. History records few cases in which unfledged monarchs have wrested the power from their Regents, as did Alexander, the young Prince of Servia lately, when he dismissed his Regents summarily, and with his own boyish hands grasped the sceptre. It was a bold stroke on the part of the young Prince, to defy the people of Servia in the persons of the Regents; but he had an army at his back, and a coterie of nobles urging him on. He did not hesitate to place M. Ristitch, the chief Regent, and his fellow-members, practically under arrest,—thus accomplishing by the strong hand what could not otherwise have been secured until he had reached his full majority, three years hence. The boy King is now seemingly seated securely on the throne which his father, ex-King Milan, disgraced. It will be very unfortunate for the Servians if Alexander should not prove a worthier monarch than Milan, who spent much of his time and almost all the revenues in dissipation and vice, and whose conduct finally was the cause of his abdication and exile. Alexander is the youngest reigning monarch in Europe, being barely eighteen. He comes of a very ancient and noble family—the Obrenovitches. He is said to be popular and loveable and has at least shown himself to possess the quality of gratitude, for he has appointed his tutor to an important post in the new government.

A pleasanter picture is that of the young king of Spain, Don Alfonso XIII.—who is only eight years of age. This royal lad was proclaimed king of Spain on the day of his birth, in the hope that his helpless boyhood would be an additional security to the throne and might bring peace to that distracted country. The Spaniards did not care to have his widowed mother, Queen-Regent Christina, rule over them, even nominally. She is a most excellent, careful and devoted mother, and is training her little son to appreciate the high duties before him. Besides she is a generous and loving woman, and this disposition shows itself in many different ways. On the day that little Alfonso donned his first pair of shoes, Mamma Christina gave 300 pairs to that number of poor children in Madrid. On his first birthday, 30,000 poor persons in Madrid received each a present from the Queen-Regent in the baby's name, and a hospital was founded to testify the mother's gratitude to God, and her love for her little son. The Spaniards are a stormy, impetuous race, and during the last thirty years, factious risings and rebellions have been frequent; but on more than one occasion, since Alfonso's birth, a glimpse of the Queen-mother and the baby-king have sufficed to quell such disturbances.

When he was only eighteen months old, and before he could lisp in Spanish, the baby-king presided at the opening of the Cortes or National Congress. Of course, he didn't sit on the throne of all the kings and emperors of Spain unaided; a pleasant-faced, motherly peasant from the Asturias held him on her knee while round about stood the Queen-Regent and all the royalties and grandees and statesmen and high functionaries. Mamma Christina read the "Speech from the Throne" in behalf of her little boy, who, of course, could hardly be expected to read at such an age. The chubby fellow was, as the peasant-woman afterwards admitted "real good," and did not interrupt the proceedings more than once or twice, on which occasions he attempted a speech from the throne on his own account and his prattle was as eagerly listened to as the words that fell from the lips of his royal mother. He can talk now however, and he is big enough to sit on the throne without a nurse and gives every promise of becoming a noble, earnest man and a just ruler. He is not strong in physique but is winning in his manner and has a great love for learning. There is no doubt that Alfonso will, if spared, creditably hold the reins of government in Old Castile.

EUROPE'S TRIO OF YOUNG ROYALTIES.
ALFONSO OF SPAIN, WILHELMINA OF HOLLAND AND ALEXANDER OF SERVIA.

Next comes a dainty little lady—the youngest of queens. She is Wilhemina Helena Pauline Marie of Holland, and she is just fourteen. Like Alfonso, she is under the care or guardianship of a good mother, Queen Emma, the widow of the late King William of Holland. The ex-Queen has proved herself to be a most intelligent lady, remarkable for tact, courage and energy, and while she has been the practical ruler of Holland since her husband's death, she has won the confidence and love of her people, who voluntarily made her Regent during her daughter's minority. Wilhelmina, when she comes of age, will be the ruler of 4,500,000 Hollanders, besides some 30,000,000 more subjects in the colonies of Java, Sumatra, Borneo, Guiana, Moluccas, West Indies, Surinam and other parts of the world. Her education occupies a good part of the time of the Queen-mother. No frivolities are permitted and her tutors are directed to address her simply as "Fraulein," without using any title, the mother's idea being that, in the relations of tutor and pupil, the teacher should be regarded as superior. This is really a most practical illustration of the old proverb that there is "no royal robe to learning," and that princes as well as peasants must undergo the same ordeal and perform the same labors if they would reach the distinction which belongs to men and women of cultured minds and well-stored brains.

Religious training in the royal homes of Spain and Holland has not been neglected, and both Alfonso and Wilhelmina have been reared with due regard to their religious duties. Such peculiar conditions have surrounded the boyhood of Alexander of Servia, that it is a question whether he has been equally fortunate.

An Accomplished Oriental Girl.

ONE of the most interesting and striking figures among the students of Oxford College, England, is Cornelia Sorabji, a tall, slender olive-skinned girl. Clothed in her native dress of pale blue crepe, embroidered with gold, with its mantle draped over her head like a veil, and shadowing her astonishingly large and brilliant eyes, she makes a strange picture among the rosy Englishwomen with their fashionable gowns. At eighteen, and Professor of Literature in the University at Bombay, she still thirsted for broader opportunities and found her way to Somerville, and attracted attention by her brilliant examination papers for the history and literary schools. The Government decided, however, that a woman, with knowledge of law, was needed to collect evidence in the Zenanas, and she immediately entered upon a legal course. After six months' study, her papers on Roman law were held by the examiners to be the most remarkable and able ever presented by any student of either sex in the University. Prince Dhuleep Singh's two daughters are also members at Somerville, and on its rolls stand very many of the most noted and noble names of England. These are probably the best examples at the present time of the actual progress in University life that has been achieved by women native to the East and therefore laboring under peculiar disadvantages.

A Boy's Larger View.

A BOY goes to business, and at his business begins by simply doing the things he is told to do, and doing them in a common and ordinary way, writes Rev. Lyman Abbott. If he stops here, he remains all his life long a drudge. But if he begins to see that business has a significance, that his life is not merely sweeping the store, not merely writing letters, not merely selling goods, if he begins to see the higher life involved in business, if he begins to see that business is a greater instrument of beneficence than what we call beneficence, that trade is clothing thousands of men where charity clothes ten, that agricultural and milling industries are feeding thousands of men where charity feeds ten; if he begins to see how the whole history of the world is linked together, and is God's way of building up humanity and serving humanity—as he gets this larger view, and enters it, life is enriched, and becomes itself the minister whereby love is enlarged and conscience is strengthened.

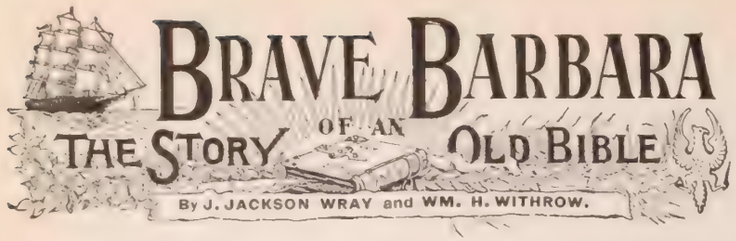
THE CONDUCTOR'S DREAM.

HE had been on the train all day, had met all kinds of people, received all sorts of treatment, punctured all kinds of tickets, shouted "All out!" and "All aboard!" till throat, and head, and hand, and foot were weary, writes Dr. Talmage. It would be a long while before we would get to another depot, and so he sagged down in the corner of the car to sleep. He thought that he had just stepped on the platform of his car, and a lady handed him a bouquet fresh from the hot-house. A long line of railroad presidents and superintendents had come to the depot to see him off, and tipped their hats as he glided out into the open air. The car was an improvement on Pullman's best. Three golden goblets stood at the end, and every time he turned the spigot of the water-eask, it foamed soda-water—vanilla if you turned it one way, strawberry if you turned it the other. The spittoon was solid silver, and had never been used but once, when a child threw into it an orange-peeling. The car was filled with lords and duchesses, who rose and bowed as he passed through to collect the fare. They all insisted on paying twice as much as was demanded, telling him to give half to the company and keep the rest for himself. Stopped a few minutes at Jolly Town, Gleeville and Velvet Junction, making connection with the Grand Trunk and Pan-Handle route for Paradise. But when the train halted there was no jolt, and when it started there was no jerk. The track was always clear, no freight-train in the way, no snow-bank to be shoveled—train always on time. Banks of roses on either side, bridges with piers of bronze and flagmen clad in cloth-of-gold. The steam whistle breathed as sweetly as any church-choir chanting its opening piece. Nobody asked the conductor to see his time-table, for the only dread any passenger had was that of coming to the end of his journey.

As night came on, the self-adjusting couches spread themselves on either side; patent bootjacks rolled up and took your boots off; unseen fingers tucked the damask covers all about you, and the porter took your pocket-book to keep till morning, returning it then with twice what you had in it at nightfall. After awhile the train slackens to one hundred and seventy-five miles an hour, and the conductor, in his dream, announces that they are coming near the terminus. More brakes are dropped and they are running but ninety miles the hour; and some one, looking out of the window, says, "How slow we go!" "Yes," says the conductor, "we are holding up." Now they have almost stopped, going at only seventy miles the hour. The long line of depot-lamps are flashing along the track. As the cushioned train flashes into the depot and stops, wedding-bells peal, and the gong of many banquets sounds, and white arms are flung about necks, reckless of mistake, and innumerable percussions of affection echo through the depot, so crisp and loud that they wake the conductor, who thought that the boisterous smack was on his own cheek, but finds that he is nothing but a bachelor railroad-man, with a lantern, at midnight getting out into a snow-bank.

Application: Get an easy position when you sleep, if you have any choice between angels and gorgons. Many think that sleep is lost time. But the style of your work will be mightily affected by the style of your slumber. Sound Asleep is sister of Wide Awake. Adam was the only man who ever lost a rib by napping too soundly; but when he woke up, he found that, instead of the twelve ribs with which he started, he really had nigh two dozen. By this I prove that sleep is not subtraction, but addition. This very night may that angel put balm on both your eyelids five minutes after you touch the pillow!



CHAPTER XI.

UNDER ARMS

OUR young and vigorous friend, John Lawrence, did not share the objections to a soldier's career that governed the conduct of his senior comrade, Paul Heck. In the stirring necessities of the case, with the enemy at the gates and the French peasantry deaf to the appeal of the Governor who was half out his wits for men to defend the forts, John volunteered his services, and enlisted, much to Major Featherstone's delight, in the forces that were sent to man the threatened fortress of St. John.

General Carleton got together about a thousand men, Canadians, regulars, and Indians, for the relief of that garrison. Crowding his forces into a fleet of some fifty boats, he attempted to cross the St. Lawrence, and for this purpose embarked from the quays of Montreal, and almost from beneath the windows of the house in which the Hecks and the Emburys had found a home. A great crowd of the townspeople, mothers, wives and children of the volunteers, and other non-combatants, gathered on the shore, or on the city walls to watch the departure of the flotilla.

Barbara and Mary Embury, standing at their open casement, recognized the pleasant features of John Lawrence, who had been put in charge, thanks to his experience as a bargeman on the Hudson and the St. Lawrence, of one of the bateaux which carried the small army. He had donned soldiers' attire, wore suitable accoutrements, and according to Barbara's strong opinion, looked to be what he certainly was, a "splendid fellow."

Bravely the fifty bateaux rode the waters of the St. Lawrence, and under the force of the strong arms that rowed them, resisted the downward sweep of the broad current, and carried their precious burden to the perilous haven whither they were bound. The music of fife and drum grew fainter and fainter in the distance, and a last hearty cheer went up from those who were left behind to watch and fear, to wonder, and to pray. The flotilla had almost reached the opposite bank and the soldiers were preparing to disembark, when they received a check. The American General had laid in ambush a strong party of more than three hundred men, carefully masked by the bushes that lined the shore. These were not perceived by the luckless voyagers, until they opened fire. A deadly volley of musketry and the hoarse boom of two pieces of artillery put a new complexion on the enterprise. Many men were wounded, some of the boats were shattered and began to sink. General Carleton gave the command to retreat, and the discomfited expedition slowly made its way back to Montreal.

Brave Barbara was still standing at her casement with Mary Embury by her side. She had not lost sight of the departing fleet, when the crack of the muskets, and the roar of the cannon smote upon her ear. Hastening downstairs and drawing Mary behind her, under pretence of getting their work done, she avoided explanations, and gave her excitable and sensitive companion "something to think about."

It was well; for when the luckless troops were returned and disembarked it was found that many had been slain, that many more had been sore wounded, and amongst the rest, John Lawrence, who had been shot in the arm and leg, besides receiving a deep gash in the forehead from a flying fragment of a shattered boat. He was carried ashore and up the slope towards the barrack-buildings by Paul Heck and Mike Finnigan, who had gone down to the quay in haste, and these, with the help of an Indian from the boats, bore him home.

John's wounds were not serious. The bullets had passed through the fleshy part of arm and thigh, and under such nursing as Barbara's skill and Mary's love, and Paul's tending, and Mike's bright humor would supply, the wounded man was soon convalescent.

It became pretty clear, too, that "Richard," or, rather, John, was not only to be himself again, but that Mary Embury was fated to be himself too; for there was no room for further pretence, or reason either, as to the love they bore each other; and so it was evident that if the marriage union really unites two in one, John and Mary were likely enough to become one entity when the campaign was over and John's soldiering days were done. But the present, with its awful shadows of disaster and death, was no time for the indulgence of tender emotions; and Mary and the convalescent John soon became Brave Barbara's willing lieutenants in her voluntary hospital labors. It was found that the Indian, Tookalusca, who had helped to carry the wounded John Lawrence to his quarters, had been himself wounded. With the self-repression which characterizes the Indian warrior, he had silently endured, until his growing weakness caught the observant eye of Barbara.

Our heroine, who had played so many parts in the drama of life, and who had lifted the cup of salvation to so many parched lips, had now the joy—for it was a joy of no mean order—of preaching Jesus to the "poor Indian" the while she aided the barrack surgeon to nurse him back to strength and life. Tookalusca, like most members of his race was eminently gifted with the talent of silence. It was not until the tender and kindly tending of Brave Barbara had unlocked the "secret place" of the patient's heart that she could get him to listen to the story of Jesus, or, at any rate, to frame an answer into words.

I have not space in these pages to narrate the slow, sure, resolute steps which Barbara took to bring the poor Indian within the ring of those who, in the best sense, have "seen the Lord." One thing is certain, Tookalusca, Indian brave, heathen idolater, and reckless warrior though he was, came to know and trust in the Sinner's Friend! My heroine managed to "preach unto him Jesus;" and like the black-skinned servant of Queen Candace, he "went on his way rejoicing" in that highest and choicest of all learning that can come to the mind and heart of man.

When Tookalusca was thoroughly recovered, and was again with the soldiers on the march, or in the field or camp, he used to find his way back to talk with Barbara about Jesus and his love. We shall hear again of Tookalusca; suffice it, therefore, to say here, that under the influence of this truly remarkable woman, the name of Jesus was heard among the swart denizens of the northern wilderness.

The disaster which had befallen the volunteer relief party who sought to aid the beleagured Fort of St. John, compelled the starving soldiers there to capitulate to the enemy, in unconditional surrender. The greatest part of the regular British troops in Canada had now been captured by the victorious Americans; and their commander, General Montgomery, at the head of his forces, flushed with victory, marched rapidly upon Montreal.

Our poor and sorely-handled band of immigrants from the Irish Palatinate, who had come hither to find peace, had found once again not peace, but a sword. There was no help for it, however, and gathering their brood together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under its wings, Brave Barbara held special service of prayer in the bakery of her friend Jean Baptiste Lafarge. Hither came amongst the rest, that same Major Wilson, the merchant, who was wounded in the fight at the Water Gate, and who had been nursed back to life and health by Barbara and her friend Mary Embury. Major Wilson was one of the leading merchant-citizens of Montreal, and held high civic office. He had come to hold Brave Barbara in high respect, and even reverence, and in his gratitude for her priceless services to himself, he lost no opportunity of doing her service in return.

"What are we to do, Mistress Heck?" said the merchant, just before the hour of prayer commenced. He felt himself to be in a great quandary. He knew that the commander of the city, General Carleton, would not shrink from immolating his whole handful of soldiers in an attempt to defend the city; and yet the worthy militia-officer shrank from what he felt would be a useless butchery of brave men.

"I should advise, Major Wilson," said she, seriously, "the quiet surrender of the city, without striking a blow. No defence will avail. Why should innocent blood be spilled without even the poor reward of beating an [illegible]."

On these lines of purpose and petition, the meeting for prayer was conducted, and the sentence that left the lips of Paul Heck was felt to be right, "O Lord," said he, "keep the men of strife and the men of peace apart! They are rushing together; and there will be the clash of arms and the spilling of blood, if they meet. Put thyself between them, Lord! And say to one or other of them, 'Depart! that this city may abide in peace!'"

So pleaded Paul Heck, and so prayed in heart and spirit the little band who talked with God with bowed head and bended knee, in the humble warehouse of Jean Baptiste Lafarge. Then Major Wilson repaired with other citizens to confer with Governor Carleton.

"We do counsel," said Major Wilson when he was admitted to General Carleton's presence, "one and all, for the sake of the innocent citizens, and because of the utter uselessness of prolonged resistance, we do unitedly counsel a policy of non-resistance. What can you do, General, brave as are both you and your men? Montgomery has a thousand men behind him, and there are more troops to follow. Resistance would be, not folly only, but madness and murder. Submission means safety to the city, peace to the citizens, life to your little band of brave men."

General Carleton looked at them fiercely; he pulled the grey mustaches and fidgetted nervously in his seat, evidently moved more than he cared to show by the appeal. "Citizens of Montreal," he said at last, "I believe that you are right. My reason has told me so all the time: but my duty seemed to say it Nay. We will fall back upon Quebec."

In the fitful moonlight, the troops marched to the barracks, amid the plaudits of the people. The night was spent by them in destroying the army stores that they could not carry with them. Then, in the early morning, the little garrison filed out of the East Gate, just as the attacking forces blew open the West Gate, and marched into the central square.

"What has become of Carleton and his men?" said the wondering Montgomery, addressing Major Wilson. "They are well on their way to Quebec, General," said the merchant, seriously.

"What! without striking a blow?" said Montgomery, with a strong flavor of contempt in his tones. "What led them to act so tamely," he continued, half-inclined to suspect that there was treachery and peril behind it. "The advice of a Christian woman, who wanted to spare brave lives, and win kind treatment for the citizens."

"And that she has won," said the General, well pleased to think the capture was so easily achieved.

General Montgomery treated the people with great consideration: and won their good-will by his generous and conciliating attitude. He made provision for the maintenance of public order, and, though the city remained for well-nigh eight months in the hands of its captors, Montreal was, happily, free from the sufferings which almost invariably attend the lot of the vanquished. All honor to Gen. Montgomery! But it must not be forgotten that this gracious fortune was largely owing to Brave Barbara, the praying peasant woman from the slopes of Ballygarane.

The sharp struggle that ensued between Britain and the revolted colonies for the possession of the province of Canada, took place around the city of Quebec; and the stirring events of that rough winter campaign are exciting reading for all who can find interest and enjoyment in the blood-red tales of battle, and the cruelties done and suffered by brave men. I have no taste that way. To make the story short, there followed but one more desperate struggle for the mastery. Then the American forces were withdrawn; and thus ended, the invasion of Canada during the Revolutionary War. Among the weather-beaten and travel-stained soldiers returning to home after the evacuation, were our familiar friends, John Lawrence and Lucky Mike. When the little troop marched into the barrack yard, they both caught sight of Barbara Heck and Mary Embury standing at the casement of their military-looking dwelling. In a moment, up went their Glengarry bonnets, spinning high into the air, and a characteristic sentence shouted from each of them did not fail to tell where their hearts lay.

"There's Mary!" quoth John, "God bless her!"

"There's swate Mistress Barbara! 'Cush-lama-chree!'" shouted Lucky Mike, and unable to restrain the hot Celtic energy that filled the soul of him, he broke into action and danced a perfect bandando of delight! Needless to say, the two women at the window were every whit as warm in their welcome as the new-comers were in their greeting.

Nothing would serve my fine-souled heroine, but that a special thanksgiving service should be held in the spacious bakery of their good friends, the Lafarges, and that the praises of God should be sung in commemoration of the young men's safe return, and of the termination of the deadly feud which had so long filled the land with the throbbings of the war-drums, the groans of the dying, and the sighs of those who mourned for the brave dead.

I have no space to tell of that singular religious service, except to record, as I am able to do from trustworthy documents, that it was there and then decided to establish a Methodist cause in the city of Montreal. John Lawrence was installed as temporary pastor, with no emoluments in any earthly currency. Paul Heck was instituted general official factotum, and also man of all work. Brave Barbara, Mary Embury, her son Philip, and the girls and boys of the musical Heck family became voluntary choristers. Lucky Mike, "luckier, be-dad, than any mortal man, let alone a tow-headed gossoon from an Irish bog has any raysonable ixpictancy of," became town missionary, and alike in the slums of the city, in the barracks, in the market-place, and in the way-sides and hedges, he successfully invited men and women, soldiers and civilians to the Gospel feast.

And not only so, for in a peculiarly effective manner, the warm-hearted Irish lad went about his Master's business. The gracious lessons he had learned from "Misthress Barbara, God bliss her," and the high tuition which had come into the heart of him, direct from the Spirit of the Great Teacher, had filled the whole soul of Lucky Mike with something to feel, the whole mind of him with something to know, and the lips and tongue of him with something to say. In addition to all this, he had a fund of dramatic power, a marvelous command and variety of facial contortions and expressions, and such a supply of good temper and happy wit and humor, that Mike's invitations were not only given, but accepted, and in many cases, the unlikeliest were the willingest, and followed Lucky Mike to a place at the blessed banquet where Jesus plays the host, and where Mike himself has found a welcome.

In the home of the Hecks and Emburys were gathered the rest of the Palatines, who came with them in the lumbering bateaux of the St. Lawrence, together with a few who had followed since then from the same stock of immigrants who had left the farms of Ballygarane more than twenty years before. This special gathering, partly family, partly social, partly festive, and partly in the interests of the new Methodist church was to give John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan an opportunity of telling their strange experiences as volunteer soldiers in the siege of Quebec.

Or, rather, shall we say? to give their friends an opportunity of extracting the stirring story of what was to all intents and purposes a Methodist mission under difficulties. These two soldiers of Jesus, by the aid of a third comrade, whom they found in Quebec, not only "Held the Fort" for their Captain, but "bore down upon the foe, in battle for the Lord." The story, as John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan combined to tell it to their interested and excited listeners, has come into my hands, and I count myself fortunate, indeed, for my readers' sakes, that a sketch of it can be given here. Sure, I am, that no more genuine, thrilling or worthy episode in the Holy War which is winning the world for Christ, was ever told.

"Of all the sore winters that ever it was my hard lot to feel and to shiver in," said John Lawrence, "'tis very sure that was fifty times the hardest, and a hundred times the worst."

"And since when, John Lawrence, have you larn'd so to be lashin's av fancy on the honest back av the naked truth. Is it fifty winters, or a hundred that ye mane, more betoken than that ye look more like thirty than ayther av 'em; but, maybe, your winters came in clusthers, as filberts do."

There was a merry laugh at Mike's humorous way of intimating to his comrade that he should keep well within the bounds of actual fact, and John himself, who did look almost laddishly young after so trying a campaign, accepted the rebuke, and continued,

"Well, I guess it would have been bad to breed a worse," he said with a smile. "Natur' can make a winter in Quebec hard enough and sharp enough when Jack Frost is left to his liking; but in this case man did his best, more's the shame and pity, to make matters worse. So it was that the labor was awfully hard, and the fare was miserably poor, and the clothing was mortal scarce, and the fighting was cruelly constant, and the hospitals were sorely crowded, and the fever was on the rampage, and it's hard to say whether the besiegers or the defenders were the worse off."

Closing Days of the Fund.

Money Still Flowing in and the Tabernacle's Redemption Practically Assured.

The Mischief of a Name.

There can be scarcely any question but that the flippant name of "the Grip" has kept much deserved sympathy from those attacked with that epidemic, while it has also tended to make the sufferers much less concerned about themselves than they otherwise would be. The truth is that this disease is a most serious one, and many people have died because of their failure to appreciate the fact. Its greatest havoc is made among the weak and aged people. For that distressing weakness which characterizes every genuine case of La Grippe, Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen is a specific. It offsets weakness with strength—with strength acquired in a natural way, and not by a temporary stimulant. Letters by the hundred prove this.

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—In April last I was suddenly prostrated with La Grippe which developed heart failure. I was in a very critical condition, was reported dead. When the C. O. arrived I took it according to directions, and in fifteen days thereafter was riding a mowing machine. My strength came gradually and steadily; there was no pull-back. For several years I had been troubled with Constipation, but am not now. Can enjoy a good square meal, sleep well and can do a man's work. These blessings I now enjoy I ascribe to C. O. Treatment. M. W. HUNTINGTON, Jasper, N. Y."

People who wish to keep out or put out La Grippe, should write for further particulars to DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

SATAN AND THE WORLD.*

ON the whole, Satan is well satisfied with the outlook for his kingdom in this world. He says he is content to have Christian nations send missionaries to the heathen if they will also send rum and opium as they are now doing. He is willing that rich people should give very generously to religious objects if they will get their money by dishonest, unjust, or even doubtful methods. He is willing that the churches shall be as active as they please if they will follow the ways of the world instead of the teachings of Christ. He is much pleased with the custom of requiring members to subscribe to a creed which they either cannot understand or do not believe. It encourages the spirit of equivocation and duplicity which is the very corner-stone of his kingdom. He likes to have people worship God devoutly on Sundays when they serve mammon faithfully the rest of the week.

Satan is far too wise to put forward a transparent lie in furtherance of his designs. His method is to create a partial truth with a sufficient admixture of error to create a false impression, and so to confuse issues that people will think they are following the truth when they are in reality following their own inclination. What better illustration of his shrewdness could be found than this plan of persuading the children of men that belief alone will give them "a title clear to mansions in the skies?" After that idea is once established in the mind, no amount of instruction or exhortation to morality and uprightness of life can remove the impression that conduct is of secondary importance, and has but little practical relation to the life beyond the grave. "Heaven is heaven. Those who succeed in entering will be happy. Belief is a magical key by which entrance may be effected." This false logic, for which the instructions of your Lord and Master do not give a particle of justification, is the fruitful source of nearly all the evils that have crept into the Church.

Satan understands well that his power over the world will be greatly weakened, if not entirely lost, when the truth is universally accepted that Heaven and hell are not merely definite abodes of happiness and misery, but are the results of man's own choice. If he chooses good, he becomes a child of God, and the divine life—that is, heaven—begins in his own soul. He will afterwards go to heaven because he belongs there. If he chooses evil, he rejects God and draws to himself all evil powers and influences, and gravitates to the lower kingdom by his own inward proclivities.

You know that your life on the earth is limited to a certain number of years, at the most, with a possibility that it may be terminated at any moment. Yet you plan and work as if that brief span was an eternity. You deny yourselves and live the life of slaves to hoard up money and goods to be enjoyed—when? It is a moment that never arrives. Yet still you go on in eager pursuit of these phantoms of your own imaginations. Even when you become what you call Christians, and profess to choose heavenly life in place of earthly life, you still cling to your old delusions. If this were not the case, would not your thoughts, interests and plans centre upon the world in which you expect to remain forever? When you anticipate a journey to a foreign land you do not fail to make a suitable preparation for it. You seek information concerning the characteristics of its inhabitants. You study their language and customs. If you meet others who are going to the same country, you hold earnest conversations with them on the subject, comparing views and giving and receiving information. When are groups of Christians found talking about their future home in the same natural way?

A Royal Boy-Soldier.

WARS and rumors of wars will probably continue to agitate the world until the millennial dawn. Europe never held such an armed host as now. Every kingdom and principality, great or petty, is garbed in the full panoply of battle and almost all the males, with the exception of children and the aged, are liable to be summoned for martial service.

In royal houses one of the chief branches of a prince's education is now military science. On this page we present a portrait of the young German Crown Prince, eldest son of Emperor William, in his uniform as a lieutenant in command of the 1st regiment of Prussian Foot-Guards. He is scarcely over ten years of age and is said to be one of the smartest and most intelligent princes in Europe, of an amiable disposition and quick all his studies. This mere child, whose character might be capable of the highest development and who is doubtless as kind and gentle by nature as any being in the world, is thus being trained to regard one of the principal businesses of life as the art of extinguishing his fellow-men. He was seven years old when he first wore a military lieutenant's uniform. Let us hope that, like the good old Emperor William, he may be as wise and gentle as brave, and as merciful as courageous, should the time ever come for him to assume the duties of the government. His boyish character shows both energy and seriousness, with a trace of temper and imperiousness. On one occasion he quarreled with a younger brother and inflicted punishment on him with a whip. There was some noise and the Emperor came up to inquire the cause. The Crown Prince did not hesitate in replying, "Oh, I wanted just to show this rebel who was Crown Prince." "Well, my boy," said the Emperor, "I will show you who is the Emperor." He then took the whip and rewarded him with the same treatment he had administered to his brother.

A ROYAL LIEUTENANT.

The regiment to which the German Crown Prince is attached is a troop of giants similar to the corps of the father of Frederick the Great. It is one of the most famous regiments in Germany, and is the corps in which most of the German Princes hold commissions. The men still wear the old-fashioned Swedish helmet known as the blechmutze.

GOOD DEEDS INFECTIOUS.

THE example of a kindness is never lost. It bears fruit, sometimes quickly, as in the following incident: A newsboy took the Sixth Avenue Elevated Railroad car at Park Place, New York, at noon on a Thanksgiving day, and sliding into one of the cross seats, fell asleep. At Grand street two young women got on, and took seats opposite to the lad. His feet were bare and his hat had fallen off. Presently one young girl leaned over and placed her muff under the little fellow's dirty cheek. An old gentleman in the next seat smiled at the act, and without saying anything, held out a quarter, with a nod toward the boy. The girl hesitated a moment, and then reached for it. The next man just as silently offered a dime; a woman across the aisle held out some pennies, and, before she knew it, the girl with flaming cheeks had taken money from every passenger in that end of the car. She quietly slid the amount into the sleeping lad's pocket, removed her muff gently from under his head without rousing him, got off at Twenty-third street, nodding to all the passengers in a pretty little inclination of the head that seemed full of thanks and a common secret. This rebukes Ingersoll's sneer that if he had been God he would have good things catching. They are catching and God made them so.

LIKE THE ELDER BROTHER.

"SOME years ago," says an English clergyman, "I preached one morning about the elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son. As I was leaving the church I was asked to visit a dying man. This man had been for many years a careless and irreligious man; but a great change had come over him and he had turned in sincere penitence to his Father. When I entered his room that morning I found him in great happiness, rejoicing in the near prospect of being with his Lord, and perfectly happy. When I took my leave his brother-in-law followed me downstairs, and said, 'I cannot understand this at all. Here have I been serving Christ for these twenty years, and I have never experienced such joy as he expresses; and he has not been a Christian for more than a few weeks.' Immediately I recognized the elder brother."

WOMEN EXCLUDED.

ONE of the lady workers connected with the China Inland Mission writes thus of a visit she recently paid to one of the villages in the Hunnau Province: "My work there was very discouraging. Talk as I would, I could not raise any hope in the hearts of the women; they laughed and shook their heads, saying, 'Heaven for us! No, not for us; heaven is for men, for you foreign women, perhaps, but not for us. How can we women go to heaven! We are sinners, and shall suffer for sin, there is no heaven for us,' and they laughed at the very idea. They were sinners, and it was delightful to be able to talk to them about the Saviour, but they seemed too hopeless to heed. My woman and I preached on until they all went away but one. I asked her to remember that the world's Saviour loved her, and was willing to save her; she listened, but with sadness and indifference."

THE ENEMY ON THE CONGO.

IN a letter recently received by Dr. Guinness, from one of his missionaries on the Congo, the latter says: "You ask if I can give you any particulars regarding the inroads which drink is making in this district. The natives round here are completly debased and besotted by it. A short time ago I was in a town about an hour and a half from this, trying to tell the glad news of the Saviour's love. The very atmosphere seemed to smell of gin. Outside each house was a mound containing hundreds of gin bottles. The houses, which in ordinary towns are often so neat and well-built, were wretched, tumble-down hovels, fitting types of what their owners' bodies had been reduced to through drink. It does sometimes seem so hopeless to work among a people like this! Humanly speaking, it is impossible that they should be saved, but 'all things are possible with God.' There is a similar state of things among the Loangos, who are employed here. On Sundays, when they are not working, one can scarcely get them sober to talk to. What we want is that an act should be passed forbidding the death-dealing liquor to enter the Congo river."

Clean your Straw Hat with Pearline.

Directions.

First brush out all the dirt possible. Then, with a sponge, wash the hat with the ordinary Pearline solution (in the proportion of a tablespoonful to a pail of water.) Steam it well over the nozzle of a kettle; rinse well with sponge and warm water; press into shape, and dry.

You can do all this at home at a cost of less than one penny. It's simple enough, if you have Pearline—but, with Pearline, every kind of washing and cleaning is simple.

Directions for the easiest way, on every package.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, do the honest thing—send it back. 341 JAMES PYLE, New York.

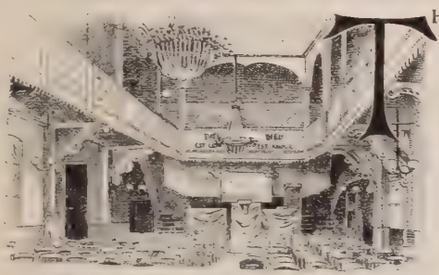
The Late Rev. R. W. McAll's Twenty Years' Labor among the Communists and Anarchists of Paris—More than 100 Halls opened in France through his Efforts.

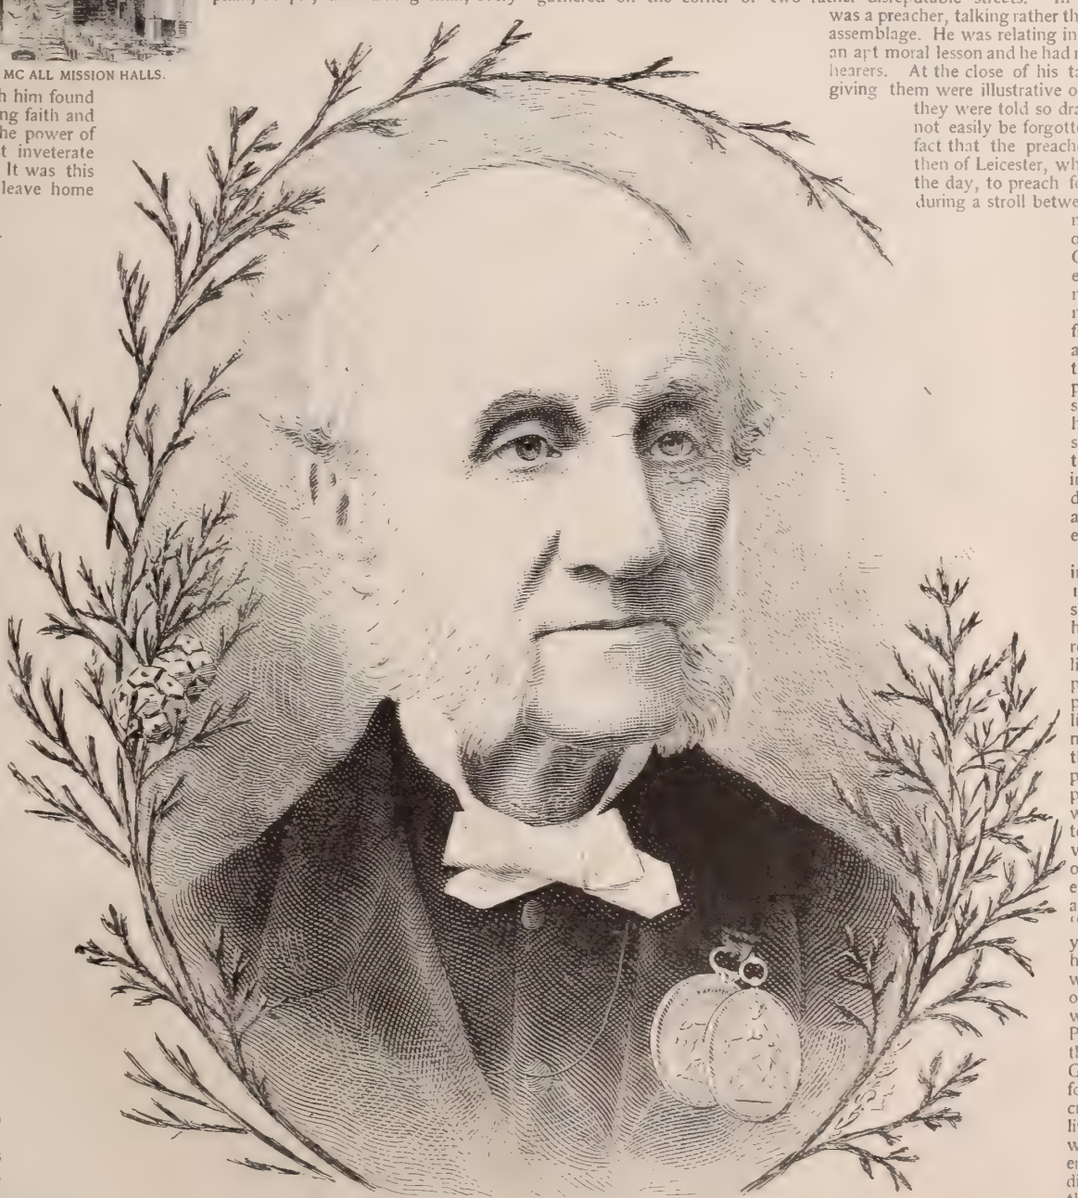


INTERIOR OF ONE OF THE MC ALL MISSION HALLS.

THE sad intelligence of the death of the Rev. R. W. McAll, the missionary to the anarchists and communists of Paris, was briefly mentioned in this journal last week; we are now enabled through the kindness of Mrs. Parkhurst, the President of the American McAll Association, to publish a picture of this famous evangelist, reproduced from the last photograph ever taken of him. A plain, simple, unassuming man, every one who came in contact with him found him to be, but a man of strong faith and deep-rooted confidence in the power of Christ to transform the most inveterate sinner into a child of God. It was this faith which caused him to leave home and kindred and a loving, loyal congregation and go into the unpromising field of French communism, in unwavering confidence that, even there, the Gospel would exercise the power it has ever exercised wherever it has been preached. How God honored his faith in the conversion of wicked and desperate men and the transformation of fierce and abandoned lawbreakers into quiet, peaceable and law-abiding citizens, the world now knows. It has been a marvellous work inexplicable on any other theory than that of omnipotent power with which the Holy Spirit follows the preaching of Christ. Men do not like to acknowledge that power, but they cannot gainsay the facts. These facts in the communistic quarters of Paris were too conspicuous to be denied or ignored. The French soldiery and police, who knew what those quarters were and what they now are, bore witness to the change; and the French government, two years ago, acknowledged its obligation to the Protestant pastor by enrolling his name in the Legion of Honor and giving him those medals which signify to every Frenchman that the wearer has done signal service to France. Probably never before in the history of that famous Legion has the distinction of membership been conferred for purely religious services.

We often speak of the mysteries of divine Providence, and we might speak more frequently than we do of the wonderful wisdom and the adaptation of means to ends which are therein displayed, but so often escape our notice. They were conspicuous in the events which led to the great evangelistic work in the French capital. In August, 1871, Paris was in a strangely abnormal condition. It had passed through two sieges within a few weeks. From the German armies, from the forces of the national Government and, most of all, from the dynamite and torch of its own citizens the devoted city had suffered violence. Its burned palaces, its battered buildings and its blood-stained streets bore witness to the fierce and sanguinary struggles of which it had been the scene. But most ominous of all were the signs of sullen resentment and of savage hatred on the faces of large numbers of its own people. Numbers of them had been executed and their relatives were sworn to revenge; others were suffering ignominious punishment in the penal institutions, and thoughts of them filled with bitter enmity the hearts of those who loved them. None could tell how soon the fierce passions sternly and ruthlessly suppressed might burst forth in furious conflict. Into this seething Maelstrom came the quiet, gentle English clergyman. He expected to stay only a few weeks while he recuperated his exhausted energies for new efforts in the town where his church was situated. But he stayed twenty years, doing such work and winning such triumphs as amazed all who witnessed them.

Dr. McAll was at this time nearly fifty years of age. He was the son of Dr. Robert S. McAll, a famous Congregational minister of Manchester, England. He had been converted in his youth and was educated for the ministry. His first charge was at Sunderland and he subsequently ministered to churches at Leicester and Birmingham. Wherever he labored his work was of a most aggressive character. He was never content with ordinary pastoral work, but was always devising new plans for reaching out after the masses and carrying the Gospel into the homes of the poor. The writer well remembers one Sunday afternoon, in an English cathedral city, where religion is of the most dignified and respectable type, seeing a large crowd gathered on the corner of two rather disreputable streets. In the centre of the crowd was a preacher, talking rather than preaching to the motley assemblage. He was relating incidents, each pointed with an apt moral lesson and he had riveted the attention of his hearers. At the close of his talk, the incidents he was giving them were illustrative of direct Gospel truth and they were told so dramatically that they could not easily be forgotten. An inquiry elicited the fact that the preacher was Robert W. McAll, then of Leicester, who was visiting the city for the day, to preach for a brother minister; and during a stroll between the morning and evening services had used the opportunity for speaking for Christ to the idlers and loafers he had seen in the neighborhood. In the evening he was again in his friend's pulpit preaching to an aristocratic congregation, whose ideas of propriety would have been shocked had they known how his afternoon had been spent. But it was obvious that they listened to him as intently and with as much delight as did his unwashed auditors, two or three hours earlier, on the street corner.



THE LATE REV. R. W. McALL, D.D.
DIED IN PARIS, MAY 11, 1893.

It is easy to surmise how in those sad days in Paris in 1871, such a man would spend his time. Although he was there for rest and recuperation, he would be little likely to be found in pleasure resorts or in the picture galleries. He knew little French, but he had a number of Gospel tracts in that language which he put into the hands of people whom he met; and when his eyes looked into other eyes that were wet with tears, or rested on a gloomy, care-plowed brow, he would stop and say tenderly in French, "God loves you — I love you," the one phrase of his limited stock of French which was most frequently on his lips. Such words went straight to the heart. Probably, some who heard them, did not know of God's love, and others had forgotten his love in the cruel sufferings of their lives. Poor, sad, hopeless, weary of life, some miserable man would be plodding along the street, when these words would fall upon his ear like a strain of heavenly music. He would be familiar with abuse, with threats, with warnings, but not with such sympathetic words. It was not surprising that Dr McAll was urged to tell more of his message. It was like rain on a thirsty land. He held a few meetings and then returned to England. Not, however, to stay. He went merely to sever pastoral relations with his church, which would prosper under the care of any man of God, to break up his home and prepare for a long absence. He was soon back in Paris to cast in his lot with the people whose

The Tabernacle Pulpit

TIMBREL OF JUBILEE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Exodus 15 : 20, 21: "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

SERMONIZERS are naturally so busy in getting the Israelites safely through the parted Red Sea, and the Egyptians submerged in the returning waters, that but little time is ordinarily given to what the Lord's people did after they got well up, high and dry, on the beach. That was the beach of the Red Sea, which is, at its greatest width, two hundred miles, and at its least width, twelve miles. Why is the adjective "Red" used in describing this water? It is called the Red Sea because the mountains on its western coast look as though sprinkled with brick dust, and the water is colored with red seaweed, and has red zoophyte and red coral. This sea was cut by the keels of Egyptian, Phoenician and Arabic shipping. It was no insignificant pond or puddle on the beach of which my text calls us to stand. I hear upon it the sound of a tambourine, for which the timbrel was only another name. An instrument of music made out of a circular hoop, with pieces of metal fixed in the sides of it, which made a jingling sound, and over which hoop a piece of parchment was distended, and this was beaten by the knuckles of the performer. The Israelites, standing on the beach of the Red Sea, were making music on their deliverance from the pursuing Egyptians, and I hear the Israelitish men, with their deep bass voices, and I hear the timbrel of Miriam, as she leads the women in their jubilee. Rather lively instrument, you say, for religious service—the timbrel or tambourine. But I think God sanctioned it. And I rather think we will have to put a little more of the festive into our religious services, and drive out the dolorous and funereal, and the day may come when the timbrel will resume its place in the sanctuary. But that which occupied the attention of all the men and women of that Israelitish host was the celebration of their victory. They had crossed. They had triumphed. They were free. More wonderful was this victory and defeat than when the hosts of Richard overcame the hosts of Saladin at Azotus, than when at Bannockburn, Scotland was set free, than when the Earl of Northumberland was driven back at Branham Moor, than when at the battle of Wakefield, York was slain, than when at Bosworth Field, Richard was left dead, than when the Athenians under Miltiades at Marathon put the Persians to flight, for this victory of my text was gained without sword or catapult or spear. The weapon was a lifted and prostrated sea. "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand: and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

Brooklyn Tabernacle to-day feels much as Moses and Miriam did when they stood on the banks of the Red Sea after their safe emergence from the waters. By the help of God and the generosity of our friends here and elsewhere, our $140,000 of floating church debt is forever gone, and this house, which, with the ground upon which it stands, represents $410,000, I this day re-consecrate to God the Father God the Son and God the Holy Ghost. A stranger might ask how could this church get into debt to an amount that would build several large churches. My answer is, Waves of destruction, stout as any that ever rolled across the Red Sea of my text. Examine all the pages of church history, and all the pages of the world's history, and show me an organization, sacred or secular, that ever had to build three great structures, two of them destroyed by fire. Take any of your biggest life insurance companies, or your biggest storehouses, or your biggest banks, or your biggest newspaper establishments, and let them have to build three times on the same foundation, and it would cost them a struggle, if not demolition. My text speaks of the Red Sea once crossed, but one Red Sea would not have so much overcome us. It was with us Red Sea after Red Sea. Three Red Seas! Yet, to-day, thanks be to God, we stand on the shore, and with organ and cornet, in absence of a timbrel, we chant: "Sing ye unto the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." But why the great expense of this structure? My answer is, the immensity of it and the firmness of it. It cost over $34,000 to dig the cellar, before one stone was laid, reaching as the foundation does from street to street, and then the building of the house was constructed in a way, we are told by experienced builders, who had nothing to do with it, for durability of foundation and wall such as characterizes hardly any other building of this city. To the day of your death and mine, and for our children and grandchildren after us, it will stand here a House of God and a Gate of Heaven.

For me, personally, this is a time of gladness more than tongue or pen or type can ever tell. For twenty-four years I had been building churches in Brooklyn and seeing them burn down, until I felt I could endure the strain no longer, and I had written my resignation as pastor and had appointed to read it two Sabbaths ago, and close my work in Brooklyn forever. I felt that my chief work was yet to be done, but that I could not do it with the Alps on one shoulder and the Himalayas on the other. But God has interfered and the way is clear, and I am here, and expect to be here until my work on earth is done. Why should I want to go away from Brooklyn? I have no sympathy with the popular sentiment which defames our beloved city. Some people make it a part of their religion to excoriate and belittle the place of their residence, and there has been more damage, financial and moral, done to our city by this hypercriticism than can ever be estimated. The course of our city has been onward and upward. We have a citizenship made up of hundreds of thousands of as good men and women as inhabit the earth, and I feel honored in being a citizen of Brooklyn, and propose to stay here until I join the population in the Silent City out yonder, now all abloom with spring flowers—sweet types of resurrection!

My thanks must be, first to God, and then to all who have contributed by large gift or small to this emancipation. Thanks to the men, women, and children, who have helped, and sometimes helped with self-sacrifices that I know must have won the applause of the heavens. If you could only read with me a few of the thousands of letters that have come to my desk in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, you would know how deep their sympathy, how large their sacrifice has been. "I have sold my bicycle, and now send you the money," is the language of one noble young man who wrote to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "This is my dead son's gift to me, and I have been led to send it to you," writes a mother in Rhode Island. A blind octogenarian invalid in York, Pa., sends his mite and his prayer. Thanks to all the newspaper press. Have you noticed how kind and sympathetic all the secular newspapers have been, and, of course, all the religious newspapers, with two or three nasty exceptions? You say that newspapers sometimes get things wrong. Yes, but which of us does not sometimes get things wrong? If you want to find a man who has never made a mistake, do not waste your time by looking in this pulpit. Thanks to the editors, and reporters, and publishers. Gentlemen of the Brooklyn and New York printing-press, if you never report anything else that I say, please to report that. Yes, I see you are getting it all down.

As a church, we, from this day, make new departure. We will preach more instructive sermons. We will offer more faithful prayers. We will do better work in all departments. We will, in the autumn, resume our Lay College. We will fill all the rooms of this magnificent pile with work for God and suffering humanity. More prayers have been offered for this church, and on both sides the sea, than for any church that has ever existed, and all those prayers will be answered. Clear the track for the Brooklyn Tabernacle! "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

But do you not now really think that the Miriam of my text rejoiced too soon? Do you not think she ought to have waited till the Israelitish host got clear over to Caanan before she struck her knuckles against the timbrel or tambourine? Miriam! You do well to have the tambourine ready, but wait a little before you play it. You are not yet through the journey from Egypt to the Promised Land. You will yet have to drink out of the bitter water of Marah, and many of your army will eat so heartily of the fallen quails that they will die of colic, and you will, at the foot of Sinai, be scared with the thunder, and there will be fiery serpents in the way, and many battles to fight, and, last of all, the muddy Jordan to cross. Miriam! I have no objections to the tambourine, but do not jingle its bells or thump its tightened parchment until you are all through. Ah, my friends, Miriam was right. If we never shouted victory till we got clear through the struggles of this life, we would never shout at all. Copy the habit of Miriam and Moses. The moment you get a victory, celebrate it. The time and place to hold a jubilee for the safe crossing of the Red Sea, is on its beach and before you leave it. It is awful, the delayed hosannahs! The belated hallelujahs! The postponed doxologies! The trains of thanksgiving coming in so long after they are due! It is said, do not rejoice over a revival too soon, for the new members might not hold out. Do not thank God for the money you made to day, for to-morrow you might lose it all and more. Do not be too grateful for your good health to-day, for to-morrow you may get the grippe. Do not be too glad about your conversion, for you might fall from grace. Do not rejoice too soon over a church's deliverance, because there might be disasters yet to come. Oh, let us have no more adjourned gratitude. The time to thank God for a rescue from temptation is the moment after you have broken the wine flask. The time to thank God for your salvation is the moment after the first flash of pardon. The time to be grateful for the comfort of your bereft soul is the first moment of Christ's appearance at the mausoleum of Lazarus. The time for Miriam's tambourine to sound its most jubilant note is the moment the last Israelite puts his foot on the sand of the parted inland ocean. Alas! that when God's mercies have such swift wings, our praises should have such leaden feet.

Notice that Miriam's song in my text had for its burden the overthrown cavalry. It was not so much the infantry or the men on foot over whose defeat she rejoiced with ringing timbrel, but over the men on horseback—the mounted troops! "The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." There is something terrible in a cavalry charge. You see it is not like a soldier afoot, thrusting a bayonet, or striking with a sword, using nothing but the strength of his own muscle and sinew, for the cavalryman adds to the strength of his own arm, the awful plunge of a steed at full gallop. Tremendous arm of war is the cavalry! Josephus says that in that host that crossed the Red Sea there were fifty thousand cavalrymen. Epaminondas rode into battle with five thousand cavalrymen, and Alexander with seven thousand. Marlborough depended on his cavalry for the triumph at Blenheim. It was not alone the snow that despoiled the French armies in retreat from Moscow, but the mounted Cossacks. Cavalrymen decided the battles of Leuthen and Leipsic and Winchester and Hanover Court House and Five Forks. Some of you may have been in the relentless raids led on by Forrest or Chalmers or Morgan or Stuart of the Southern side, or Pleasanton or Wilson or Kilpatrick or Sheridan of the Northern side. The army-saddles are the thrones of battle. Hurricanes in stirrups are the cavalrymen. No wonder that Miriam was chiefly grateful that the Egyptian cavalrymen, pursuing the Israelites down to mid-way the Red Sea, were unsaddled, unstirruped, unhorsed. Miriam struck the centre of the tambourine with the full force of her right hand when she came to that bar of the music: "The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." Ah, my friends, it is the mounted troubles that we most fear. The little troubles we can endure. The cinder in the eye, the splinter under the nail, the thorn in the foot, the social slight, the mean fling, the invidious comparison, or the remarks that snub. The annoyances and vexations on foot we can conquer, but, alas! for the mounted disasters, the bereavements, the bankruptcies, the persecutions, the appalling sicknesses, that charge upon us, as it were, with uplifted battle-axe or consuming thunderbolt of power. There are those among my hearers or readers who have had a whole regiment of mounted disasters charging upon them. But fear not. The smallest horse-fly on the neck of Pharaoh's war charger, passing between the crystal palisades of the upheaved Red Sea, was not more easily drowned by the falling waters than the fifty thousand helmeted and plumed riders on the backs of the fifty thousand neighing and caparisoned war chargers. And I have to tell you, Oh, child of God, that the Lord, who is on your side now and forever, has at his disposal and under his command, all waters, all winds, all lightnings, all time, and all eternity. Come. look me in the face while I utter the word God commands me to speak to you: "No weapon formed against you shall prosper." Don't throw away your tambourine. You will want it as sure as you sit there and I stand here, and the tune you will yet play on it, whether standing on Beach of Time or Beach of Eternity, will be the tune that Miriam played when she cried: "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." I expect to have a good laugh with you in heaven, for the Bible says in Luke, 6th chapter, 21st verse: "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh." We shall not spend all eternity psalm singing, but sometimes, in review of the past, as Christ says, we shall laugh. There is nothing wrong in laughter. It all depends on what you laugh at, and when you laugh, and how you laugh. Nothing, it seems, will more thoroughly kindle our heavenly hilarities after we have got inside the pearly gate, than to see how, in this world, we got scared at things which ought not to have frightened us at all. How often we work ourselves up into a great stew about nothing. The Red Sea before may be deep and the Egyptian cavalry behind us may be well mounted, but if we trust the Lord, we will go through no more hurt by the water than when in boyhood we rolled our garments to the knee and barefoot crossed the meadow brook on the old homestead. The odds may seem to be all against you, but I guess it will be all right with you if you have God on your side and all the angelic, cherubic, seraphic, and archangelic kingdoms. "If God be for you, who can be against you?" Lay hold of the Lord in prayer, and you will go free as did Richard Cecil with twenty pounds of missionary money in his saddle-bags, and the highwaymen grabbed his horse by the bridle and told him to deliver, and he prayed God for safety, and suddenly one of the robbers said, "Mr. Cecil, I once heard you preach. Boys, let the gentleman go." But let me criticise Miriam a little for the instrument of music she employed in the divine service on the sandy beach. Why not take some other instrument? The harp was a sacred instrument, why did she not take that? The cymbal was a sacred instrument, why did she not take that? The trumpet was a sacred instrument, why did she not take that? Amid that great host there must have been musical instruments more used in religious service. No. She took that which she liked the best, and on which she could best express her gratulation over a nation's rescue. Let everyone take her, or his, best mode of divine worship and celebration. My idea of heaven is that it is a place where we can do as we please and have everything we want. Of course, we will do nothing wrong and want nothing harmful.

How much of the material and physical will finally make up the heavenly world, I know not, but I think Gabriel will have his trumpet, and David his harp, and Handel his organ, and Thalberg his piano, and the great Norwegian performer his violin, and Miriam her timbrel, and as I cannot make music on any of them, I think I will move around among all of them and listen. What a day it will be when we stand on the beach of heaven, and look back on the Red Sea of this world's sin and trouble, and celebrate the fact that we have got through, and got over, and got up, our sins and our troubles attempting to follow gone clear down under the waves. Oh, crimson floods, roll over them, and drown them, and drown them forever! What a celebration it will be—our resurrected bodies standing on the beach, whose pebbles are amethyst and emerald and agate and diamonds! What a shaking of hands! What a talking over old times! What a a jubilee! What an opportunity to visit! In this world we have so little time for that, I am looking forward to eternal socialities. To be with God and never sin against him. To be with Christ and forever feel his love. To walk together in robes of white with those with whom on earth we walked together in black raiment of mourning. To gather up the members of our scattered families and embrace them with no embarrassment, though all heaven be looking on. A mine in Scotland caved in, and caught, amid the rocks, a young man, who, in a few days, was to have been united in holy marriage. No one could get heart to tell his affianced of the death of her beloved, but someone made her believe that he had changed his mind about the marriage and wilfully disappeared. Fifty years passed on, when one day the miners, delving in the earth, suddenly came on the body of that young man, which had all those years been kept from the air and looked just as it was the day of the calamity. Strong, manly, noble youth, he sat there looking as on the day he died. But no one recognized the silent form. After a while they called the oldest inhabitants to come. A woman, with bent form and her hair snowy white with years, came last, and looking upon the silent form that had been so completely preserved, gave a bitter cry, and fell into a long swoon. It was the one to whom half a century before, she was to have been wedded, looking then just as when in the days of their youth, their affections had commingled. But the emotion of her soul was too great for mortal endurance, and two days after, those, who fifty years before, were to have joined hands in wedlock, were at last married in the tomb, and side by side they wait for the resurrection. My friends, we shall come at last upon those of our loved ones who long ago halted in the journey of life. They will be as fair and beautiful, yea fairer and more beautiful than when we parted from them. It may be old age looking upon childhood or youth. Oh, my Lord, how we have missed them! Separated for ten years or twenty years or fifty years, but together at the last. Will it not be glorious? Miriam's song again appropriate, for death, riding on the pale horse, his hoofs on our hearts, shall have been forever discomforted. I see them now—the glorified! Assembled for a celebration mightier and more jubilant than that on the banks of the Red Sea, and from all lands and ages, on beach of light above beach of light, gallery above gallery, and thrones above thrones, in circling sweep of ten thousand miles of surrounding and upheaved splendor: while standing before them on "sea of glass mingled with fire," Michael, the Archangel with swinging sceptre beats time for the multitudinous chorus, crying: "Sing! Sing! Sing ye to the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

To Bring Men to Christ.

Some Spiritual Hints by One Long Active in the Work.

PROBABLY no more interesting or helpful little volume on Christian work has appeared in late years than that recently written by Rev. R. A. Torrey, Superintendent of the Chicago Bible Institute, with the attractive title: "How to Bring Men to Christ." Dr. Torrey lays down in plain terms these conditions of success in evangelistic effort:

"1. The one who would have real success in bringing others to Christ must himself be a thoroughly converted person. Jesus said to Peter, "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." He was in no condition to help his brethren until he himself, after his cowardly denial, had turned again to his Lord with his whole heart. If we would bring others to Christ we must turn away from all sin, and worldliness and selfishness with our whole heart, yielding to Jesus the absolute lordship over our thoughts, purposes and actions. If there is any directions in which we are seeking to have our own way and not letting him have his own way in our lives, our power will be crippled, and men lost that we might have saved.

"2. The one who would have real success in bringing others to Christ must have a love for souls, i. e., a longing for the salvation of the lost. If we have no love for souls, our efforts will be mechanical and powerless. We may know how to approach men and what to say to them, but there will be no power in what we say and it will not touch the heart. But if like Paul we have "great heaviness and unceasing pain in our hearts" for the unsaved, there will be an earnestness in our tone and manner that will impress the most careless.

"3. The one who would have real success in bringing men to Christ, must have a working knowledge of the Bible. The Word of God is the word of the Spirit. (Eph. 6: 17.) It is the instrument God uses to convict of sin, to reveal Christ and to regenerate men. If we would work together with God, the Bible is the instrument upon which we must rely, and which we must use in bringing men to Christ. We must know how to use the Bible so as (1) to show men their need of a Saviour, (2) to show them Jesus as the Saviour they need, (3) to show them how to make this Saviour their own Saviour, (4) to meet the difficulties that stand in the way of their accepting Christ.

4. "Solid work in soul-winning must be accompanied by a prayer at every step. We must pray to God to lead us to the right persons to approach. God does not intend that we speak to every one we meet. If we try to do it, we will waste much valuable time in speaking to those which we cannot help, nor do good, that we might have used in speaking to those to whom we could have done much good.

"5. The one who would have real success in bringing men to Christ must be "baptized with the Holy Ghost." "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost, is come upon you," said Jesus to his disciples after having given them the great commission to go out and bring men to himself. The supreme condition of soul-winning power is the same to-day: "After that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." A later chapter is devoted to a study of what "the baptism of the Holy Ghost" is and how any Christian can obtain it.

REMEMBER THY CREATOR.

S. S. Lesson for June 11. Eccl. 12 Golden Text, Eccl. 12: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD our Creator! How many there are who seldom think of him as such! Our Saviour? Yes; we need salvation. Our Shepherd? Yes; we need his care. Our Provider? Yes; we need our daily bread. In every relation which he bears to us by which we constantly benefit, the Lord is widely known among those who know him at all. But as the Creator; as the Originator of all things, as he to whom all belongs by truest right, how little is God known! This is why in his people are so little recognized and respected. "Know ye that the Lord he is God: it is he that hath made us, and we are his." (Ps. 100: 3, R.V.) By the fact of creation, we are his property; absolutely, unquestionably his. It is the glory of our God to make something out of nothing; he "calleth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4: 17); "he raiseth up the poor from the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory.

Holy, becoming reverence springs from a true Scriptural contemplation of our Creator. Who is he, and who am I? The answer is to fall in the very dust before him, ashamed that so much as a breath, a feeling, a word of self-importance has ever asserted our miserable and fallen selves. The age in which we live is an age of self assertion and self importance. Real greatness is never self assertive. The most truly great men have always been the most really humble, because conscious of the exceeding greatness of their Creator.

The Creator is remembered in many of the prayers in the Old Testament, just as the Redeemer is the theme of the praises in the New Testament. God as Creator has a right to expect his creatures to bow and to do him reverence. "For the invisible things of him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead. So that they are without excuse, because that, when they knew God (i.e. as the Creator of all) they neither were thankful." (Rom. 1: 20, 21.) None but the "fool" can ignore that a Power greater than that which is created must have brought this world into being, and must uphold and regulate it continually. And the sin which God lays to the charge of man is that he does not recognize, and seek to know, that mighty Being whose works surround him, that he is not thankful to the God that made him, and in whose hand his breath is. This was the sin of the blasphemous Belshazzar; he had failed to glorify the God in whose hand his breath was. This was the sin of the rich man in the parable, who in his life time received his good things, without any acknowledgement of the hand which gave them.

The strongest argument against idolatry is the powerlessness of the miserable idols which the heathen worship. "Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods: yea, do good or do evil, that we may be dismayed." (Isa. 41: 23.) In splendid contrast is the appeal: "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or, being his counsellor hath taught him? . . . Have ye not known? have ye not heard? hath it not been told you from the beginning? have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth? It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in."

Remember then thy Creator, and what is due to him, not only when trouble comes, not only in the days when the power to enjoy life fails, but "in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say: I have no pleasure in them." Why do young men so often scoff at God and holy things? Is it not from a mistaken conviction that God is not really their friend, and that they can do better for themselves that he can for them? Let the life of every true follower of Christ bear witness against such an idea; let the world know, that it is the infinitely better part to serve God.

There is a terrible idea abroad, even among those who have not altogether broken loose from a certain regard for God, that young men must first "sow their wild oats" before we can expect them to turn their attention to serious things! O this diabolical idea that sin is a necessity! Whence comes it but from the bottomless pit? There are no such noble men as those who have fully served God from their youth up. A young man who will calmly calculate how far he can go in sin, and yet in the end be saved; who will, with the awful depravity of the arch enemy, sum up the probabilities of how far his body can stand his sins against himself, and his soul stand any chance of salvation after deliberate, and against God, has already so much of the atmosphere of hell about him, that it would seem as though the impenetrable darkness of the unpardonable sin were already hanging over him. Heavenly arithmetic leads the young man so to number his days that he may apply his heart unto wisdom. The young man who remembers his Creator in the days of his youth, places at the disposal of his Creator the whole of his being "to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." Such a young man was the saintly Robert McCheyne, whose short life and ministry has left such a savor of Christ behind him, that the very mention of his name always recalls the name of Jesus.

Remember thy Creator, before his creations in thy body shall break down, and all thy powers shall fail. It is a miserable, pitiable thing when the earthly tabernacle fails, the eyes grow dim, and the ears grow dull, the hands ("the keepers of the house) tremble," and the loins ("the strong men) shall bow themselves," and the teeth ("the grinders) cease because they are few," and the eyes ("those that look out of the windows) be darkened," and the ears ("the door) shall be shut in the streets when the sound of the grinding is low, and sleepless: "he shall rise up at the voice of the bird," and the voice ("all the daughters of music) shall be brought low"—if the man has lived utterly, irretrievably in vain! All the functions which have worked systematically, the silver cord (the spine) the golden bowl, the pitcher, the wheel, (the action of the heart and other internal organs) cease, "because

Man Goeth to His Long Home."

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." And then? Then what will be the harvests from the sowing of wild oats? Most surely, in the dread hour, an unsaved man shall surely reap what he hath sown.

Let us look at the contrast. A man who had remembered his Creator in the days of his youth, who, even in his unconverted days, had lived as far as his light went "in all good conscience before God" (Acts 33: 1), when he comes to contemplate dissolution, looks through death as if it were but a gauze veil, and says: "Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day." (II. Cor. 4: 16.) And again through our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heaven." (II. Cor. 4: 16.) Paul does not see death, he has an eye which penetrates to the other side, and sees resurrection. Yes: even on earth, he knows, by faith, that the process of transformation to the image of God's Son is going on, "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind," which will by and bye, when Jesus comes, be crowned by a transformation of our bodies too, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." when "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." He "shall fashion anew our body of humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory." Then it will be seen how worth the while it has been to remember our Creator, to know our Redeemer and the power of his precious blood in the days of our youth; to calculate, not how little but how much we could serve him. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment and every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE preacher finishes his study of life with a chapter which has given rise to various interpretations. Some students find in it an allegorical description of old age and decrepitude. There may be this meaning in it, but the surface meaning is beautiful and true, if we go no deeper to look for allegory. Remember your Creator, he says, in your youth before evil days come. Then he describes the inevitable end, when death comes, as a storm sweeps over a tropical city. The clouds gather, the sky is lowering and fear strikes every heart. The guards at the palace gates tremble; the women quit their casements, scared at the lightning; the servants stop grinding at the hand mills; the musicians cease playing; and the guests at the table leave the meal untasted. Death comes like such a storm, putting an end to all activity; and man lies useless like a broken wheel or a broken pitcher. That is the end and again the preacher utters his sorrowful refrain, "all is vanity." Such is his conclusion and he commends it to the attention of his readers by a statement of his position as one of the wise, or public teachers, and refers to the care and thoroughness of his studies. His teaching, he says, has two purposes. One like a goad to urge the student to further research and the other like a nail well-fastened, or a stake, holding him to the eternal truth; both purposes having the same source in God. Then he gives in one epigram the whole essence of all his work and study and experiments in search of the highest attainable good. Fear God and keep his commandments. He has tried pleasure, business, politics, study, but in none is there the satisfaction and peace and rest and security that there is in conforming to God's will. That is the best for this life; of so much the preacher's long search has convinced him; and, looking forward doubtfully, but hopefully, he sees a great assize at which the wrongs of life will be righted, the secret evil-doer will be unmasked, men will appear in their true colors, and truth and justice will be vindicated.

Remember thy Creator. Spurgeon used to say: "A man who lives in this world without thinking what he will do when he leaves it, is like a man who registers at a hotel, selects his room, orders wines and all the delicacies in season. He stops at the hotel for some time living on the best that can be had there. By and by the bill is forthcoming, and it takes him by surprise. 'I never thought of that.' 'Why,' says the landlord, 'here is a man who is either a born fool or a beat. What! never thought of the reckoning—never thought of settling with me!'" After this fashion too many live. They eat and drink, and sin, but they forget the inevitable hereafter, when for all the deeds done in the body, the Lord will bring us into judgment.

The years when thou shalt say I have no pleasure in them. Those years come very insidiously. Their approach is not heralded by warnings. A man drifts into them almost without knowing it. While he is young his heart is tender and his conscience sensitive, but gradually both are hardened. "It is," says a famous preacher, "like the freezing of a pond. The first film of ice is scarcely perceptible; but once let it film over and remain quiet and the glaze thickens over the surface, and it thickens still, till at last it is so thick and hard that a wagon might be driven over the solid ice."

Fears shall be in the way. Even good Christian people are sometimes troubled at the approach of death. If a man is not triumphant or even peaceful in death, we must not assume that his faith is weak. The causes may be mental or physical. A Scottish minister who was visiting a pious member of his flock, who was near death, said to the dying Christian, "Well my friend, how do you feel yourself to-day?" "Very weel, sir," was the reply, "very weel, but just a wee confused wi' the flittin'." In Scotland a person who is moving from one house to another with his furniture is said to be "flitting."

The spirit shall return unto God. It is set free and passes to another realm where human power cannot reach it. Among the ministers who were ejected from their benefices in England under Charles II. and were sent to prison, was one, William Jenkyn. The good man was confined in Newgate among criminals of the vilest kind and the prison itself was foul and pestiferous. He sent a humble petition to the king for pardon and with it there was a certificate from the prison physician that the minister's health had broken down. For some reason, probably because the preacher had incurred the enmity of some lady about the court who had influence with the king, Charles declared that he would not pardon him. "Tell Jenkyn," said he, "he need not petition, for he shall never be released." But a few days afterward, Jenkyn fell a victim to the prevalent epidemic and died. "Please your majesty," said a lord to the king, "That man Jenkyn has got his liberty." The king looked up angrily, "Ah," he asked, "who dare give it to him?" The nobleman paused a moment and then said, "One who, Jenkyn said, is King of kings." Charles answered not a word, but was evidently solemnized.

The words of the wise are as goads. They need to be very sharply pointed or some of those whom they are intended to stir up to duty will not feel them. Buchsell relates that a man attended his church who habitually slept all through the sermon. He snored at intervals and annoyed the preacher and congregation. Through the most earnest and rousing appeals and through the most bright and sparkling passages he would sleep on. Buchsell noticed a bright boy sitting near the sleeper and meeting him during the week he asked him if he would sit immediately behind him and touch him from time to time to keep him awake. The boy would not undertake it but agreed to do so when the preacher promised him a groschen for the service. The next Sunday there was an amusing contest. The drowsy man settled himself to sleep as usual and was dropping off when a touch from the boy aroused him. The lad earned his groschen and the sleeper lost his nap. Buchsell wanted to renew the contract for the following Sunday but the boy declined. Buchsell said he would give him one groschen as before; but the boy said, no, the sleeper had already given him two to be allowed to slumber in peace. When a man does not want to learn, and would prefer not to be disturbed in his sin, he usually has his way, unless God, by his Spirit, arouses him.

The preacher sought to find acceptable words. In the town of Goslar in the Hartz mountains there is a fountain in the principal square. It is evidently very ancient and it is very beautiful. There is however one defect in it. Both the jets and the basin into which the water falls are above the reach of any one The way the people have to get the water from the fountain is for each one to bring a long spout or pipe with him. This he puts up to a jet and the water runs through it into his pitcher. It seems never to have occurred to the townspeople that it would be a good thing to attach a pipe permanently to the fountain for general use. Some preachers talk in so lofty a style that their hearers need to bring a dictionary with them if they are to get any of the water of life from the sermon. They do not seek to find "acceptable words."

Every secret thing. "I will tell you," says a quaint writer, "a dream of a friend related to me by himself. Said he 'I dreamed the day of judgment was come, and all men appeared before Christ. Some were white; others had dark spots upon them. Methought I was all white, saving that I had one dark spot upon my breast which I concealed by holding my hand over it. The vast throng was separated into two companies and I was with the white ones on the right hand. Glad was I; but at last one came and plucked my hand from my breast. Then the spot was revealed and I was thrust out into the other company on the left hand.' Let us all pray: Search me and see if there be any wicked way in me; for the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin."

How the Gospel Work Took Root in Oregon—The Need of More Workers and Christian Education in the Northwest.

FIFTY-nine years have sped since an Indian from Oregon stood in the streets of St. Louis, pleading for some one to take the "white man's Book of Heaven" back to his far-away people. It was denied him, for none cared to undertake the long, perilous journey over the mountains to that unknown country. But the appeal did not pass unheeded, for soon Dr. Whitman of New York, who had heard of the desire of the Indians of Oregon, was chosen by the American Board of Foreign Missions for the work in that region, and with sublime trust and courage, he started westward. With the eye of faith, he looked down through a half century and saw the thousands upon thousands that now people the plains and valleys of the State of Washington. He heard the call not only of the Indian but of the white settlers in the new territory, who were without Christian privileges. He foresaw that the Northwest of the future was destined to prepare workers for the fields of Alaska, China, and Japan.

Since the first breaking of ground for the Gospel among the tribes of the Northwest, every year has increased the demand for teachers. "Send us Christian workers, teachers and preachers; build schools where the young may be prepared for this service," is the cry. In the story of Christian progress and development, no part of the Northwest presents a more interesting record than the State of Washington, whose early white settlers had to contend with all the perils incident to Indian warfare and relentless persecution. One of the Flathead Indian chiefs, however, proved a friend to the whites. In the Indian war of 1856, Chief Seattle conveyed a warning to the inhabitants of the little white settlement of an intended massacre, and many lives were saved. Through his kindness, however, he incurred the enmity of his tribe; and with his daughter, Angeline, he took refuge in the fort with the settlers. Angeline is still living at a great age—it is said she has passed 102 years.

A remnant of the Flathead tribe is to be found on Whidby Island in Puget Sound, where they have the their dwellings along the beach. They are now fairly civilized, thrifty and seemingly happy. Sailing up the harbor from either the port of Seattle or Whatcom, one can see the village of Coupeville, where many live. This place has also 500 white inhabitants. Strangely enough, this beautiful island town which still shelters some descendants of the native chief who first befriended the whites, is now the scene of the first serious effort at Christian training on the model of the Academic training schools of the East. It is only a few decades since the present State of Washington was practically an unknown land to all except a few. Now, thousands of settlers people its rich valleys and plains. They have come from the middle West, the far East and from Europe to its borders.

In the midst of this tumultuous growth, and while religion was universally neglected, a missionary of the Gospel, confronted by the great question, "How can we best work for Christ here?" raised by personal solicitation ten thousand dollars to establish and develop a home-school where the essentials of Christianity might be taught, and consecrated men and women trained for missionary and evangelistic work. It was located in a geographical centre on Whidby Island. Puget Sound Academy has since become a power for Christ and humanity. Many men and women of mature age have been received who have had no previous instruction in God's Word and who have there learned to know Christ.

For seven years it has been one of the bright oases in a country where commercial strife, rival speculations, immense business plans, and worldly selfishness tend to teach the young that there is nothing but money worth getting in life. The place is on an island of 200,000 acres, the largest of the many isles of that Mediterranean of America. In front, the harbor, four miles long and two broad, nearly cuts the island apart. Beyond, Mt. Erie's blue peak smiles from Fidalgo Island, and Mt. Baker looms up like a giant. Mt. Rainier is visible to the south. Yet in the midst of such inspiring scenes, men in the rush for gold forget their Maker; Sabbath desecration, the saloons, gambling dens, and vice in many forms threaten the moral ruin of the young commonwealth. It is to counteract these influences that such places as this training academy are sorely needed in Washington. Prof. Chas. E. Newberry, the Principal, has performed a faithful service of five consecutive years. The Principal of the Women's Department, Miss F. Olga Obenauer, is a graduate of Olivet, and a daughter of one well-known in the W. C. T. U. Circle, Mrs. Emma Obenauer, of Michigan. There are competent teachers in all the various branches, some of them from the famous Eastern Colleges. An effort is being made to secure a $20,000 endowment for the work, but owing to the financial depression in the West, success is delayed. Hon. Mr. Reeves, of Seattle, has charge of this special effort in the West, and Miss N. D. Sheldon, a member of the Faculty of the institution, is now visiting in the East on the same business. The scope of the work, when fully developed, will include a Summer school, similar to that held at Northfield, Mass., under Mr. Moody's supervision, a branch American Kindergarten, and a manual training department. It will thus become, as its founders designed, the Christian training centre of the Northwest, sending out workers of thorough scholarship and complete spiritual equipment for the duties before them. Five hundred have already been taught during the past seven years. With wider facilities, their number might be greatly multiplied, and the training school on Whidby Island might be made the armory of a race of Christian soldiers who would conquer the Northwest for the Saviour.

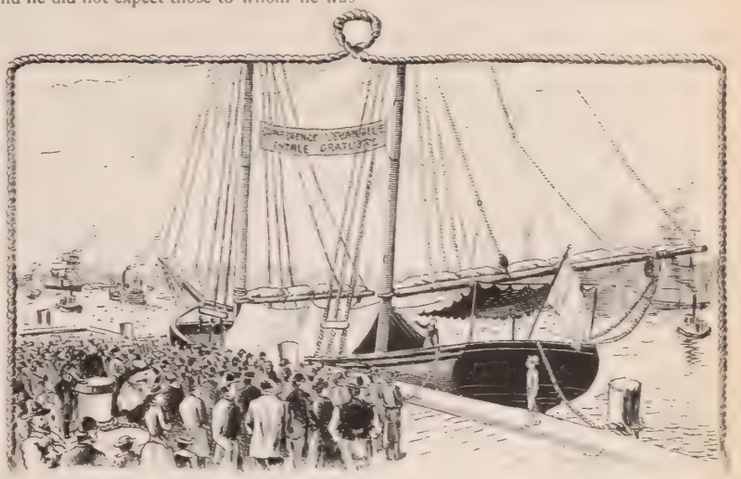
burdens were so heavy and whose need so great. It was a heroic self-denying act; for there was no society to give him an income and he did not expect those to whom he was to minister to pay him. He had a small patrimony, which would suffice for the modest wants of himself and his wife, and he determined to give himself to the work among these Paris people without reward. During all the twenty years of his life there, he defrayed his own expenses and died a poor man; but thousands of poor French families who learned the way of life through his efforts, made him rich in blessing.

It was to Belleville, the focus of all the worst elements of Parisian communism, that Dr. McAll and his devoted wife directed their steps. That suburb of Paris was originally outside the city walls, but now forms the north-eastern part of the city, the circle of fortifications having been so widened as to embrace it. It contains a population of about one hundred thousand. The houses in general are mean, and the streets narrow. The character of the whole district for squalor and crime was notorious. There Dr. McAll opened his first hall.

The first public meeting in this mission was held January 17th, 1872. The interest manifested from the outset encouraged Dr. McAll to open a second station at Menilmontant near the cemetery of Pere LaChaise on March 4. The district was one of the wildest and most lawless in Paris, but from the beginning the room was well filled. This station was always very dear to Dr. McAll, for it was there that he was permitted to rejoice over his first converts and the number of those, old and young, who have received Christ at that station is known to be very large. It soon became necessary to hire a larger room in the neighborhood and the present hall, which will hold two hundred persons, was secured. Connected with it at the present time is a Mothers' Meeting, a Young Women's Society, and a very interesting Fraternal Society. The work gradually extended, and in his first annual report, Dr. McAll announced that four stations were in operation, with an aggregate seating accommodation of 515, and at an annual cost of $1770, for rent, taxes and light. In his twentieth annual report issued last year he was able to report twenty-one regular stations in Paris with an aggregate seating accommodation of 5060, besides six halls where meetings were held occasionally. In addition to these there have been opened thirteen stations in the environs of the city and in the different provincial districts of France nearly a hundred halls are now occupied, making a total of 136 places in which, through the impetus of the movement initiated by Dr. McAll, the Gospel is being preached to the people. As the movement extended, helpers became necessary. Some were, like Dr. McAll, able to give their labor freely, others needed partial support and a few were maintained altogether at the cost of the Mission. The total expenses for the year 1891-92 amounted to $87,220. This sum included not only the rents and taxes on the halls and the salaries of Bible women and other helpers, but the costs of a dispensary, recently opened, at which a physician and a dispenser give attendance to the sick.



THE MCALL MISSSION GOSPEL BOAT.

The funds for the support of the Mission have been contributed chiefly by Christian people in our own land and in England. Last year England sent him $37,115 and the United States sent nearly $35,000. In many of our large cities associations have been organized to support the work, and many of them support wholly or in part stations, which are called after the names of the cities thus respectively contributing to their maintenance. Besides this, special contributions have been made for purchasing and equipping a mission boat, a picture of which appears on this page, which plies on the Seine and other French rivers and thus reaches country districts not otherwise accessible. Services are held on board this boat and much good has been done through them. Dr. McAll was deeply concerned lest his death, which during the past few months he perceived to be approaching, might interrupt the progress of the Mission. In order to prevent such a contingency, he recently placed the management in the hands of a Board of Directors, of which he was President, and Dr. Edward G. Thurber the pastor of the American Church in Paris was Vice-President. He also made a special journey to England to organize Societies on the pattern of those in America to systematically collect money for the support of the Mission. Such concern was natural in a man who for more than twenty years had labored so earnestly for the cause. It may be hoped that the Christian public both here and in England will accept the duty as a sacred trust and see to it that the work shall not languish for lack of means. A FALSE STANDARD.

DO not build your happiness upon mere social position. You have come out from your home, and you have looked up at a great house, and coveted a life there, when, perhaps, at that very moment, within that house, there may have been the wringing of hands, the start of horror, and the very agony of hell. I knew such an one. Her father's house was plain, most of the people who came there were plain; but, by a change in fortune such as sometimes comes, a hand had been offered that led her into a brilliant sphere. All the neighbors congratulated her upon her grand prospects; but what an exchange! On her side it was a heart full of generous impulse and affection. On his side it was a soul dry and withered as the stubble of the field. On her side it was a father's house, where God was honored and the Sabbath light flooded the rooms with the very mirth of heaven. On his side was a gorgeous residence, and the coming of mighty men to be entertained there; but within it were revelry and godlessness. Hardly had the orange blossoms of the marriage feast lost their fragrance, than the night of discontent began to cast here and there its shadow. The ring on the finger was only one link of an iron chain that was to bind her eternally captive. Cruelties and unkindness changed all those splendid trappings into a hollow mockery. The platters of solid silver, the caskets of pure gold, the headdress of gleaming diamonds, were there; but no God, no peace, no kind words, no Christian sympathy. The festive music that broke on the captive's ear turned out to be a dirge, and the wreath in the plush was a reptile coil, and the upholstery that swayed in the wind was the wing of a destroying angel, and the bead-drops on the pitcher were the sweat of everlasting despair!

[illegible] among those who seek in social life their chief happiness! It matters not how fine you have things; there are other people who have them finer. Taking out your watch to tell the hour of day, some one will correct your time-piece by pulling our a watch more richly chased and jeweled. Ride in a carriage that cost you eight hundred dollars, and before you get around the park you will meet with one that cost two thousand dollars. Have on your wall a picture by Copley, and before night you will hear of some [illegible] studio of Church or Bierstadt. All that this world can do for you in ribbons, in silver, in gold, in Axminster plush, in Gobelin tapestry, in wide halls, in lordly acquaintanceship, will not give you the ten-thousandth part of a grain of solid satisfaction. The English lord, moving in the very highest sphere, was one day found seated, with his chin on his hand, and his elbow on the window-sill, looking out, and saying: "I wish I could exchange places with that dog."

Mere social position will never give happiness to a woman's soul. I have walked through the halls of those who despise the common people; I have sat at their banquets; I have had their friendship; I have heard from their own lips the story of their disquietude; and I tell the young men and women that they who build on mere social position their immortal happiness, are building on sand.

EVERYDAY HEROES.

THE heroes of toil do their work uncomplainingly. It is comparatively easy to lead a regiment into battle when you know that the whole nation will applaud the victory; it is comparatively easy to doctor the sick when you know that your skill will be appreciated by a large company of friends and relatives; it is comparatively easy to address an audience when in the gleaming eyes and the flushed cheeks you know that your sentiments are adopted; but to do sewing where you expect that the employer will come and thrust his thumb through the work to show how imperfect it is, or to have the whole garment thrown back on you to be done over again; to build a wall and know there will be no one to say you did it well, but only a swearing employer howling across the scaffold; to work until your eyes are dim and your back aches, and your heart faints, and to know that if you stop before night your children will starve. Ah! the sword has not slain so many as the needle. Heroes of the needle. Heroes of the sewing-machine. Heroes of the attic. Heroes of the cellar. Heroes and heroines. Bless God for them!

There are men who for their toil and anxiety have no sympathy in their homes. Exhausting application to business gets them a livelihood, but an unfrugal wife scatters it. He is fretted at from the moment he enters the door until he comes out of it. The exasperations of business life augmented by the exasperations of domestic life. Such men are laughed at, but they have a heart-breaking trouble, and they would have long ago gone into appalling dissipation but for the grace of God. Society to-day is strewn with the Wrecks of men who under the north-east storm of domestic infelicity have been driven on the rocks. There are tens of thousands of drunkards in this country to-day, made such by their wives. That is not poetry! That is prose! But the wrong is generally in the opposite direction. You would not have to go far to find a wife whose life is a perpetual martyrdom. Something heavier than a stroke of the fist; unkind words, staggerings home at midnight, and constant maltreatment, which have left her only a wreck of what she was on that day when in the midst of a brilliant assemblage the vows were taken, and full organ played the wedding march, and the carriage rolled away with the benediction of the people. What was the burning of Latimer and Ridley at the stake compared with this?

And what shall I say of those people who have only a half loaf of bread, but give a piece of it to others who are hungrier; and of those who have only a scuttle of coal, but help others to fuel; and of those who have only a dollar in their pocket, and give twenty-five cents to somebody else; and of that father who wears a shabby coat, and of that mother who wears a faded dress, that their children may be well apparelled. You call them paupers, or ragamuffins, or emigrants. I call them heroes and heroines. You and I may not know where they live, or what their name is. God knows, and they have more angels hovering over them than you and I have, and they will have a higher seat in heaven.

Go home to the place just where God has put you to play the hero or the heroine. Do not envy any man his money, or his applause, or his social position. Do not envy any woman her wardrobe, or her exquisite appearance. Be the hero or the heroine. If there be no flour in the house, and you do not know where your children are to get bread, listen, and you will hear something tapping against the window-pane. Go to the window and you will find it is the beak of a raven, and open the window, and there will fly in the messenger that fed Elijah.

Subscriber, Delaware, O. Where did Cain's wife come from? See Gen. 4: 16?

She was probably a native of the country of his exile—the word Nod signifying flight. Commentators have vainly tried to locate the place of Cain's settlement some placing it "east of Eden," others in India and different parts of Asia.

Leander White, Harrisburg, Pa. Was Simon of Cyrene who aided the Saviour in carrying the cross, a white man or a negro?

He is believed to have been a native of North Africa, and hence colored as was Philip's convert, the Ethiopian eunuch and Apollos, the great preacher of Alexandria. The early history of Christianity furnishes many illustrious examples of men and women of color who suffered and died for the faith.

A. F. Calerdine, Hartwell, O. Who was Theophilus, mentioned in Luke 1: 3?

He is by some held to have been a Roman Governor, a man of rank, to whom Luke inscribed his Gospel and the Book of Acts. The other commentators have questioned the personality of Theophilus, holding that he was a creation of the writer, representing all those who are "beloved of God," which the word Theophilus means. Still others intimate that he was a nobleman of Antioch.

J. C. Lawson, Algiers, La. Is there any difference between shorthand and stenography?

No; stenography is shorthand, or writing by brief, arbitrary signs; while phonography is also shorthand, but is written by signs that represent certain sounds. There are several excellent systems; Pitman's probably being the oldest.

H. W. Schenck, Junction City, Ohio. 1. We are on a [illegible] to be entertained. What shall we talk about when our old bachelor neighbor drops in occasionally Sabbath afternoon and stays several hours? Is it right to talk of crops, politics, etc.? 2. Is it right for us to go to a friend's house for dinner Sunday, the church, the friend or acquaintance living near the place of meeting, which we go three miles, and then stay the rest of the day and talk on various subjects, sing, etc.? That is the custom here among good Christian people, and it we constantly refuse to join them they feel hurt. Please [illegible] me to a correct view on these matters.

1. It is not necessary to offend or alienate your friend, and if you exercise the ordinary tact of a host, you will be able to avoid it, and at the same time to give the conversation a more sensible turn. There are a thousand current topics in connection with religious papers that can be introduced, no matter how the conversation begins; but to be able to interest your friend concerning them, you should first read and master them yourself. 2. Under the circumstances we see nothing wrong in it, as you state it.

J. H. Trevor, Huntly, Neb. 1. What is the abomination of desolation mentioned in Matt. 24: 15? 2. To what class of people will Christ come as a thief? 3. What generation does Christ refer to in Matt. 24: 34? 4. Do the signs of the times indicate the near approach of Christ's coming?

1. Prophetic expositors generally believe that it is the image of himself which Antichrist will cause to be set up in the Temple at Jerusalem which is to be rebuilt in the last days. 2. To all except those who are watching and expecting him. The expression simply means that it will take them by surprise. 3. The generation which witnesses the beginning of these events will witness the end of them. The theory of prophetic expositors is that the stream of prophetic events has been interrupted. That there is an undefined interval between the sixty-ninth and the seventieth week mentioned by the prophet Daniel. The events of the seventieth week of seven years will follow each other with extraordinary rapidity so that one generation will see them all. 4. Several articles on prophecy recently printed in this journal give reasons for holding that belief.

E. M. L., New York. I have the Oxford Teachers' Bible, but it has not a dictionary proper of "Persons and Places" such as I would like.

You need the "Oxford Helps" which contain what you want. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD supplies the "Helps," neatly bound in flexible cloth, to its subscribers at 50 cts., being one-half the regular price.

Emma Whitcomb, Pittsburg, Pa. 1. What was the age of Lucy Larcom when she died? 2. What was her best poem? 3. Where did she receive her training?

1. Lucy Larcom, the poet, was born in 1826, and was consequently 67 when she died. 2. She wrote many beautiful poems, and it would be difficult to indicate the best. "The Mountaineer's Prayer," "A Thanksgiving," "A White Sunday," and "Climbing to Rest," are all notable pieces. 3. She was a cotton spinner when she first began to write verses and Mr. Whittier helped her and published some of them in a paper he edited. Miss Larcom received some training, later, in an Illinois Seminary. She was a natural poet and would probably have written verses had she never gone to school.

An Old Subscriber, Central City, Colo. 1. Please explain Job 14: 1-5 verses? 2. What is the present population of London?

1. Job, in using the language of these verses, undoubtedly represented his own grevious and seemingly hopeless case. He was ina despondent mood when he drew this gloomy picture of man's physical state. But he spoke only of the mortal and not of the spiritual or regenerate condition; for we must not forget that it was Job who later in the same discussion showed his triumphant faith by declaring "I know that my Redeemer liveth." (Read Job 19: 25, 26, 27.) 2. The population of London, according to the last census was 4,231,431. The city proper over which the Lord-Mayor presides is a comparatively small section with only about 30,000 population.

Four score years and nine are numbered
Since I drew my vital breath,
Now with ribs my flesh encumbered,
Signals of approaching death.

While my evening shadows lengthen
As my sun draws near the west,
May its beams my ardor strengthen
My fond hope of endless rest.

In still hours of night I ponder,
God's past mercies call to mind;
Then I pause, and think, and wonder
Why my Father is so kind.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

AN AMERICAN IN TANGIER.

EMPHATIC advice to all Christian people, who love a peaceful life, not to travel in Morocco, comes from a correspondent of the New York Herald who is now in that land. He writes from Fez to which city he recently traveled from Tangier. He considers himself fortunate in arriving safely, for his experiences in Tangier and on the journey convinced him that his life was far from safe. Although the people are very assiduous in their attendance at the mosques, and in their devotions in public places, they are prone to robbery and murder. Their antipathy to Christians is more violent than that of other Moslems and the murder of one of them would not be a burden on any man's conscience. Indeed, many of them believe that by no surer way could they establish Paradise than by taking a Christian's life. "It diminishes the pleasure of riding about the streets of the quaint city," says the correspondent, "to be aware that he is surrounded by strong, powerful men holding this belief." He carried a revolver with him to defend himself, but a friend who knew the city well advised him not to use it, but to make himself feared and respected by other means. What these were appeared from his first adventure. As he walked through the street, followed by his servant, a man whom he met, uttered a curse upon him, asking Allah to wither the stranger's body. Instantly he bade his servant seize the man and take him before the Basha, or judge, to be thrashed for insulting him. Recent complications with England and France have inspired the Sultan with a wholesome dread of foreign governments and he has enacted laws for the protection of foreign visitors. A crowd gathered about the man evidently sympathizing with him but afraid of compromizing themselves. The appearance of a soldier decided the matter and the crowd dispersed. The offender threw himself on his knees and piteously pleaded for mercy. As he was evidently in dread of the punishment and as the American believed that a sufficient lesson had been administered, he ordered the culprit released, but bade him tell his friends that like mercy would not be granted to the next offender. That the inoffensive stranger should have to resort to such measures to avoid molestation is an evidence of the difference between the two religions. While the most consistent Mohammedan is the most bitter hater of the Christian, the most consistent Christian is he who most loves his enemy. (Matt. 5: 44.)

A Novel Funeral Ceremony.

THE words of the Potestant Episcopal funeral service, "Ashes to ashes," had an unusually literal meaning at a funeral held in St. George's Church, New York, on May 19. Dr. W. S. Rainsford conducted the exercises over the ashes of one of his parishioners whose body had been cremated in compliance with a request she had made during her illness. The ashes had been collected and placed in a metallic urn which was enclosed in a cedar casket covered with white cloth. The casket was eight inches square and eleven high. It rested on a handsome pedestal almost hidden among lilies of the valley, the deceased lady's favorite flower. As Dr. Rainsford read the words, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," when it is customary to cast clods of soil on the coffin after it has been lowered into the grave, the sexton produced a silver dish on which were some fine white ashes and these the clergyman sprinkled on the box. It is believed that this is the first instance of the funeral service of the church being read over the ashes of a cremated body. Though the ceremony was uncommon, there was nothing in it to indicate a lack of faith in the resurrection. The reflective Christian does not expect that the body his soul inhabits in this life will ever be his abode again, but with Paul, he expects to be clothed with a spiritual body which God will give him at the last day. (1.Cor.15: 44.)

A Teamster's Discovery.

A REMARKABLE story of the discovery of a famous mine is related by the San Francisco Chronicle. It states that the mine known as the "Noonday" in the Black Range, which is one of the richest in New Mexico, was originally discovered through an accident. One of the teamsters, who in 1887 carried freight from Lake Valley to the mining camps in New Mexico, was a hard-working man who found it difficult to eke out a decent living. In September of that year he had the offer of a load to be carried a distance of eighty miles, over the side of the Hogback, to a mining camp. As the road was narrow and of steep grade and the load heavy, several teamsters had refused it; but extra pay induced this man to accept. He succeeded in getting safely over sixty miles of the route and had reached a pass where the road was not more than three feet wider than his wagon, when one of the mules became obstinate. It kicked over the traces and would not budge an inch. The teamster whipped and coaxed in vain. In his effort to get the mule to work, he at last received a kick which rolled him off the ledge down the side of the mountain. In the brief moments of his descent in which all his life seemed to pass before him, he gave himself up for lost. But he did not fall to the jagged rocks at the base of the chasm, as he expected. His fall stopped at a ledge thirty feet down. As soon as he recovered from his shaking he looked around and saw that the rocks were rich beyond anything he knew. He climbed back to his team and eventually got his load to its destination. Then he sent to his brother in Denver to collect all the money he could and come to New Mexico. In a short time a gang of men were at work and both men are now worth large fortunes. Whatever the teamster may have thought when the mule kicked him, if he could think at all, it is safe to say that he does not now regard that kick as a misfortune since it led him to wealth. The time will come when the Christian will see his trials and afflictions in the same light if they have their intended effect in his spiritual enrichment. (II. Cor. 4: 17.)

THE GREAT MOSQUE OF TANGIER.

An Aristocratic Foundling.

THE sergeant in charge of Police eadquarters in New York, a few evenings ago, was astonished to see a policeman bring in a handsomely dressed babe. He reported that a man had stumbled over it in a hallway an hour or two earlier in the evening and handed it to him, as he did not know to whom it belonged. The child was a boy, apparently two or three weeks old. He was exquisitely dressed in the finest linen and wore a robe liberally adorned with flounces and lace. The person who had left him in the hallway had taken care to wrap him up warmly in flannels and place him where he would surely be seen. He was taken to the matron's room, after the record of his being found had been entered in the sergeant's book. As there was no clue to his name, he was recorded simply as No. 62, he being the sixty-second child who has been found this year under similar circumstances. No. 61, also a boy, had been found the previous night and was still in the matron's care. He was insufficiently clad when found, and what clothing he had on him, was of the commonest quality. He was evidently the child of poor parents, while the newcomer must have belonged to persons of means. Both were sent together to the Island to become wards of the city and both will receive the same treatment. The little aristocrat will have no advantage from his having worn expensive clothes in his infancy. The children of wealthy parents do not so often lose their advantages of birth, but they must all do so in the end and stand on an equality with their poorer brethren before God. "I perceive," said Peter, "that God is no respecter of persons." (Acts 10: 34.)

A Marriage in a Police Court.

NEWS comes from Buffalo, N.Y., of a strange marriage which took place there on May 16. A girl from Brooklyn was being tried for larceny. She was a bright, intelligent girl of very comely appearance. The sympathy of the Court and the spectators were with her, but when the evidence was given, there was no doubt of her guilt. She had been a domestic servant in the family of a citizen of Buffalo and some jewelry belonging to her employer was found in her trunk. Her grief when the case terminated in a verdict of guilty was intense. She wept bitterly and pleaded for mercy on the ground of its being her first offence. The Court listened to her plea and imposed a fine of thirty dollars, with the alternative of a month's imprisonment. She had no money, so she was being led away to prison, when a young man in court, who said he knew her, asked permission to speak to her. After a few minutes' whispered conversation, he told the Judge that he would pay the fine, if the Judge would marry them there and then. The Judge, thinking that the young man was acting hastily and imprudently, refused to perform the ceremony. Another official, who was competent to officiate, was, however, present in the court-room and he declared himself willing to marry them. The ceremony was duly performed, and then the bridegroom paid the fine and led away his wife whose tears had turned to smiles. It was said that they had formerly been engaged, but the girl had jilted him. If she forgets her obligations to the man whose love survived her disgrace and does not prove a good and faithful wife to him now that he has saved her from imprisonment, she will deserve the scorn of the world. Yet we have sorrowfully to admit that love and fidelity have not always characterized the Church, although she too is under such obligations, having been redeemed by Christ with his blood. (Eph. 5: 25-27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Executive Committee of the American Home Missionary Society is holding its sixty-eighth annual meeting in Saratoga.

Rev. Charles A. Taylor and Mr. W. F. Bischoft are conducting special meetings in the Presbyterian church at Normal, Ill., with good success.

It may save some of our correspondents time if we state here that the address of Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., is changed from Philadelphia to Albany, N. Y.

Of the thirty-eight new ministers of the Baptist faith who recently graduated from the divinity school of the Chicago university, fourteen were Swedes and two Danes.

Any pastor or congregation in the vicinity of New York desiring a pulpit supply during this summer can be put in communication with an earnest, scholarly Gospel preacher by addressing this office.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has audiences of five thousand persons in the Auditorium at St. Paul, where he is preaching every evening. The afternoon services in the Central Presbyterian Church are also crowded.

Dr. Avison, a British subject and a zealous Methodist, recently decided to go as a medical missionary to Corea under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board of Missions of the United States. At the farewell-meeting in the Sherbourne Methodist Church, Toronto, Presbyterians Congregationalists, and Methodists participated in the services.

A revival of much power has been enjoyed by the Congregational Church in Fairbault, Minn. Rev. C. W. Merrill assisting the pastor, Rev. S. A. Wallace. There are a large number of converts. At Paynesville, Evangelist D. M. Hartsough has been laboring. There are many converts and a good work in the church.

The death is announced of the Rt. Rev. William H. A. Bissell, Bishop of Vermont, who has for some months been in failing health. The Bishop was much beloved in his diocese and was highly respected throughout the church. He was seventy-nine years of age and had been a bishop twenty-five years.

The woman's foreign missionary meeting, in connection with General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and under the auspices of the six boards and societies, was held in the Church of the Covenant (Dr. Hamlin, pastor), Washington, D. C., on Monday, May 22, at 2 o'clock P. M. The afternoon was largely devoted to addresses from missionaries.

Grave apprehensions are felt for the safety of American missionaries in China if the iniquitous Geary law is enforced in this country. Now that the Supreme Court has pronounced the law constitutional it is open for the government to begin the expulsion of unregistered Chinamen. It is hoped, however, that the President will regard the law as permissive not mandatory.

Dr. Elwood H. Stokes, President of the Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Association, celebrated the jubilee of his ministry on Sunday, May 21. It was exactly fifty years since he preached his first sermon as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Stokes is nearly seventy-nine years old but his jubilee sermon showed that he was still hale and vigorous.

The meetings of the Rev. B. Fay Mills in Milwaukee, Wis., are said by a minister who writes to the Interior from that city, to have "done the city more good than can be told, and have shown the people what a mighty power for good the church of Christ may become when thoroughly engaged in a great work. The pastors and churches are rejoicing, and have their hearts and hands full of work in visiting the converts and gathering in the new members into the church."

We grieve to learn that Dr. Charles F. Deems has made no progress toward recovery. A recent visitor found him unable to speak distinctly, except by a very painful effort. His right side is paralyzed, so that he is unable to write. His mind is, however, perfectly clear. His chief distress is that he is cut off from his work. He was able to understand all that was said, and evidently appreciated his visitor's sympathy. After trying for some time in vain to say a few words, Dr. Deems at length succeeded. He said slowly, solemnly and clearly, "My faith holds out." That was his significant avowal in his sad circumstances.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

KEEPING RANK.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, May 28, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.*

Text: "Fifty thousand who could keep rank; they were not of double heart." [The last clause is more literally rendered thus: "Who were not of a heart and a heart."] 1. Chron. 12: 33.

ON this Sunday evening preceding Memorial Day we meet in God's house to worship him, to give honor to the memory of our noble dead, and to learn the lessons of duty which the day, with its sad and joyous memories, teaches. The thought of the text selected for this evening is not at the first glance, entirely clear; but when fully seen it is found to be suggestive and inspiring. We have in the chapter from which the text is taken, as Dr. Samuel Cox has reminded us, five muster-rolls, from the archives of the Hebrew people. In some cases the lists are accompanied by marginal notes by an intelligent contemporary, perhaps by David himself. These notes, of course, add vastly to the historic value of these national rolls. Such lists fortunately we have of our own civil war. We have histories by professional historians, and also by our noble and immortal soldiers.

But of what interest are these old Hebrew muster-rolls to us? It would be easy to show that they are of great value to us simply as students of human history, of military tactics and of various forms of government; but I call attention to them at this time especially to emphasize the commendation given in the text. That commendation is full of tender instruction for us as we contemplate the muster-rolls of brave men dear to our hearts; muster-rolls on which are names crowned with honor and radiant with glory. There are American campaigns and muster-rolls which are full of tender memories for us to-night.

It may not seem a very wonderful thing to you that fifty thousand men could keep rank. You may say, it is the business of soldiers to do that. Still it is much to keep rank, not simply on the parade ground, but amid the storm of battle. It is a great honor to say that soldiers could repel a charge or make an assault with an unbroken line; that when brave fellows fell fast, other brave men were ready to close up the ranks, and so present an unbroken front to the foe. But the chief lesson here is the secret of the bravery of David's soldiers—"they were not of a heart and a heart." They did not have one heart for the home and another heart for the battle-field; not one for self and another for David. They had but one heart for David, for country, for God. They were under the control of an overmastering purpose. They forgot everything but the honor of the King and the salvation of the country. Double-hearted men are a failure always and everywhere. But the singleness of purpose, the entire devotion of David's men made them irresistible. It ought to be remembered that it was their unity of heart that led to their uniformity of step; this singleness of purpose in the hearts of David's men that kept them in rank and enabled them to present an unbroken line to the foe. We need men today with similar unity of heart, uniformity of step and invincibility of courage in every duty [illegible]

We need men with the courage to keep rank when great principles are at stake, when the existence of civil and religious liberty is the issue. Great principles are necessary to make men brave in national crises. We ought not to separate widely between our piety and our patriotism. The man who loves God most tenderly will love his country most loyally. The bravest soldier for truth and God should be the bravest soldier for flag and country. I am now addressing men who, I trust, are as loyal in religious faith as they are brave in their devotion to their country in peace or in war. It is extremely difficult to realize that a whole generation has grown up since the war; that the boys of '61 are the mature men of '93; that the mature men of '61 are now feeling the infirmities of age, and that for some of them the final muster-roll is nearly ready. To many even in this congregation the war is only a tradition, and to others it is history, not differing widely from other chapters in the story of our beloved land. There are, in our congregations now, those who remember as among their childish memories the spirit-stirring drum and "the pride, pomp and circumstance" of the war. There are others who remember how their fathers and mothers and older members of the family listened for the cry of the newsboys announcing the reports of the battles of the previous day, and how the lists of the dead and wounded were scanned to see whether loved names were there. But many of you remember the marches and counter-marches, the toils and trials, the dangers and defeats, the sorrows and joys of the war with a vividness that is even now almost painful. It is fitting that this evening these memories should be revived and the lessons of the war should be emphasized.

One hears in certain quarters slighting remarks of the Grand Army, and of our soldiers as a whole. These remarks are usually made by men in the North whose only relation to the army was to fire envenomed darts into the backs of our soldiers, or at the most to send a substitute to the front. The day will never come when the Republic shall cease to honor her brave defenders! Could that day come, America would deserve to be excluded from the sisterhood of the noblest nations. No braver men fought on the field of Marathon; no braver men shouted for liberty among the Swiss Alps, than those who marched from their quiet homes in the North to fight the battles of their country, and many of them to lay their bodies in Southern graves. God forbid that the country should forget her brave soldiers! She will decorate their graves the day after to-morrow with flowers, and although these flowers shall fade, the memory of the soldiers will be forever green in the kindly thoughts and tender affections of their countrymen. Battle flags may decay, and the grass may grow over the graves where sleep our dead heroes, but their brave deeds will forever remain as an imperishable chapter in the glorious history of the Republic.

Brave men, I remark in the next place, will keep step to the sentiment of appreciation of the noble part taken by American women during the trying days of our Civil War. Their heroism in many respects was more sublime than that of the men. They endured in the quiet of their homes without the excitements of the battlefield. In their patient suffering they were upheld by serene hope, by loyal devotion to their country, and by sublime faith in God. The men on the field of battle were under the excitements of music and the shouts of both armies; they were stimulated by the infernal scream of shells, the rattle of musketry, and the booming of cannon. They had also the magnetic influence of brave men by their side; and they were cheered by the [illegible] But the women were alone in the silence of their homes by day, and in the more awful silence of the night. Their hearts were breaking with anxiety for father, husband, son, brother or lover fighting the battles of their country hundreds of miles away. We shall not forget on these memorial days the women who went to nurse the sick and wounded; the women who walked hospitals without fear of fever, and in defiance of pestilence; and the women who [illegible] tering to the comforts of soldiers on the field. To-day let us crown these women with unfading garlands. They are still in large measure the hope of the Republic.

General Trumbull in a recent article tells us of the bravery of one family to whom it is an honor in this connection to refer. In his company, raised at the beginning of the war, was a man of forty-five, a man of influence and wealth. He had a devoted wife and eleven loving children. The eldest son enlisted with his father, and as father and son passed the home on their way to the field, at the gate stood the wife and mother and the remaining ten children. Each one of them, including the baby, waved a flag as the father and eldest brother passed. In the first battle this noble son fell shot through the body. "Tom," said a comrade, are you badly hurt?" "Yes," said he, "I am dying. Give my love to my mother." This comrade rode up to the father and told him that his son was dead. For a moment the brave man fell forward on his horse's neck, and a great sob burst from his heart. Then straightening himself up he exclaimed, "Thank God he died like a brave man! God help his poor mother!" And then cheering on his men he rushed into the battle. After the battle was over the announcement of her son's death was made to this patriotic mother. The news was terrible, but she bore it with heroic resignation, and in the silent watches of the night she mingled mourning for her dead boy with anxiety for her living husband. A year pased. This husband had been made a Lieutenant-Colonel. His regiment had been engaged in a terrific battle; painfully anxious was the noble wife in the quiet home. Looking over the paper the next day, she found among the dead the name of her husband. No sooner had she and the second son made that discovery then the second patriotic boy said, "Mother, I ought to go." And that heroic woman said, "Go!" The days went by, she watched and waited, hearing the sound of a battle in every breeze. A great battle had again been fought; again she eagerly searched among the names of the killed and wounded, and there among the dead, killed at the front, was the name of her boy. Then stood before her the third son repeating the language of the second, and hearing from his mother the word, "Go!" and he went, and like his father and two brothers, he died fighting bravely for his country.

General Trumbull adds that after the war was over he was riding from Waterloo in Iowa to Independence. A lady in the same car suddenly became ill. She was accompanied by her daughter. The daughter recognized the General and came to him saying, "My mother wishes to see you." Approaching the woman he found in her, she knowing him though he did not remember her, the wife of his friend and the mother of the three brave boys. She thanked the General for his care over husband and sons, and for the kind letter he wrote her the day that Tom was killed; and she then said: "The war is over, the country is saved, and I am satisfied; but my heart is broken, and I am going to my old home in Ohio to die." These are the women who make a country great; these are the women who ought to receive honor on this Memorial Day; these are the women whose names will be held in loving memory in all the future history of our great Republic.

We ought to keep rank to the progress of the larger civilization which necessitated the late war, and which was also accelerated by it. Our Civil war was a period of education, emancipation, and general progress. These helpful influences it exercised not over America alone, but over the whole world. European nations could not understand how a Republic could disband a million men and have them return to the peaceful pursuits of industry. It was prophesied in Europe that the military idea would ever after be dominant in our government, and that the United States would be a military Nation; but the soldiers were disbanded and soon became absorbed in the civil population. The United States has been the leader and the teacher of all Nations by this remarkable example. The late war was really but one act in the great drama of American history. It was but a chapter in the story of the conflict between aristocratic privilege and equal rights. Our fathers came to these shores to found a Nation on the principles of equal liberty. They came when the mother country was wrapt in the darkness of caste; they came to lay the foundations of a Nation which should enjoy the right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness, but unfortunately slavery existed. There was an "irrepressible conflict" between the North and the South. It was a conflict between two civilizations. The fruits of liberty and of slavery both grew from seed sown in transatlantic soil. The civilization of the South was that of the middle ages. The planter with his slaves represented the baron and his retainers of mediæval times. Slavery was an exotic in American soil, and in the nineteenth century. The spirit of the North belonged alike to the newer age and the progressive country. It was impossible that these two civilizations could live long side by side on American soil. The conflict was sure to come sooner or later.

But never did braver men march under any country's flag than those who met the heroes of the South on the bloody fields of battle. Sherman's march from Atlanta to the Sea does not lose its honors when compared with the crossing of the Alps by Hannibal, and the campaigns of Grant will lose none of their lustre when placed side by side with those of old world heroes through all the centuries of history. Men inspired by the loftiest patriotism and holiest faith are ever the bravest. We remember that Frederick the Great once overheard his favorite general engaged in prayer, and was about to utter a sneering remark at the general's piety, but the brave old man who had never feared a foe nor his majesty's jest, said: "I have just been asking aid from your majesty's great Ally." Men with such religious faith are irresistible on the battlefield. No foe could stand before Cromwell's "Ironsides," who rushed into the conflict chanting psalms and offering prayers. Their watchword was "The Lord of hosts is with us;" and in the pocket of every soldier was a Bible with marked texts for their instruction and inspiration. General Havelock's bravest men were chosen from his prayer-meeting, for the most desperate attacks. On occasions demanding special heroism, volunteers were always selected from Havelock's "Saints."

Where do you always find the bravest men and the noblest women? In the Church of God; in the army of the Lord. Where the grandest examples of heroism, self-sacrifice, and noble consecration, but in the Church of God? Who but true believers have made the page of history illustrious with deeds of immortal valor? For the love of God and souls brave men have become braver still, and tender women have been transformed into heroines in life and saints in death. They have gone into dungeons damp and loathsome, they have gone from country and friends to the jungles of India and the swamps of Africa, and they have been stretched on the rack and dragged to the stake. They dyed the Alpine snows with their blood; they have trodden the glens of Scotland and climbed its rugged hills, and finally went up from the Grass Market in Edinburgh in a chariot of fire to glory and to God. They have been the Havelocks and the Gordons in battle; they have been the Polycarps, the Chrysostoms, the Luthers and the Bunyans in perils and in deaths for their faith. To-day the loftiest manhood and the divinest womanhood of the world are in the Church of God. Let infidelity hide its diminished head. The glory of manhood is the outcome of Christian faith and love. Christian faith consecrates patriotism and makes brave soldiers for flag and country, braver, manlier, and nobler still.

We must with united heart keep step to the spirit of magnanimity with which Gen. Grant signalized the close of the fearful conflict. Beautiful were the words spoken by Gen. Roger A. Pryor, himself an officer in the Confederate army, at the seventy-first birthday dinner held on April 27th last, in honor of Gen. Grant. Gen. Pryor could pronounce no prouder eulogy on the immortal Grant than that he had overcome the apparently invincible Johnston and the brilliant Lee. But the grandest victory even of Gen. Grant was his magnanimity toward Gen. Lee at Appomattox, when Lee surrendered his sword and the great civil war ended. Grant destroyed the armies of Lee, Early, and Beauregard, but his clemency to the brave and heroic Lee made him victor over the hearts of the South, and over the hearts of all noble men throughout the world. Gen. Pryor and other eloquent speakers affirmed that the time would come when Gen. Grant would be considered as great as a statesman as now he is regarded as a soldier. His influence in settling international disputes by arbitration ought to cover him with everlasting honor. He was a pioneer in this new realm of statesmanship. There is a time coming when civilized nations will no longer think of settling their disputes by the arbitrament of the sword, than Christian gentlemen would think now of resorting to blows to settle their petty differences. There is a time coming when the nations "Shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks;" when "nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." The men who most earnestly fought the battles of the late war are most forward in recognizing that the war is over. Men who were never on a battlefield are the most ready to continue the conflict and to perpetuate the bitterness of sectional strife. Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and Mead, the heroes of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Chattanooga, Spottsylvania, Atlanta, Savannah, Winchester, Gettysburg and Appomattox, would be the first to rebuke the spirit of bitterness and to rejoice at the advent of assured peace.

We thank God that the conflict is over, that peace is secured, that liberty is universal and will be perpetual. Thank God that no bitterness now marks the spirit of any true Northern soldier. North and South are to-day one great nation. If the call came to fight against a common foe, the boys of the "gray" would march with the boys of the "blue" under our one glorious flag, for the honor of our common and beloved country. Thank God that we can say:

For now the Northern lily
Blooms with the Southern rose.

Let their mingled beauty delight our eyes to-day; let their blended fragrance be sweet perfume to the spirit of patriotism. We rejoice in one country from the lakes to the gulf, and from the mighty Atlantic to the mightier Pacific. We must learn to keep step to the spirit of a genuine American patriotism.

No soldier is worthy his name and fame except he will stand in peace for the principles for which he braved death in battle. We must insist upon equal rights for all men of all creeds in all parts of our redeemed land. There are foes against which we must still fight. The saloon is the nursery of disloyalty, anarchy, murder, and every Satanic vice. The saloon ought to be consigned to the grave where slavery lies buried; and neither ought ever to have a resurrection. Gambling houses are born of hell and they lead to their place of their birth. Pollution of the ballot-box is a crime against civilization. The ballot-box is the ark of the covenant of the Republic. Look at our fair city of New York. Who are our rulers? Are not the names of some of them mentioned almost daily in the papers as the perpetrators of the foulest crimes? Must a man be guilty of murder before he can expect office and honor in our municipal government? Are we men, or are we slaves that we submit to such indignity?

Some of you will remember that in the museum in Berlin there is a fine fresco by Kaulbach. A few years ago I stood before it in wonder and admiration. It represents the last conflict between the Goths and Huns, a conflict that settled for centuries the form of civilization in Southern Europe. The picture embodies the legend which taught that after the battle was over, the spirits of the slain still carried on in the air the terrible conflict that began on the earth. The legend is literally true in our country's history at this hour. The forces of evil are arrayed against the forces of good; superstition against intelligence; and selfish politics against true patriotism. It must be yours to rise above the bitterness of the past, above the selfishness of the present, and to stand with a true heroism, a loyal patriotism, and a Christly manliness against evil of whatever kind and wherever found.

Rightly did Milton sing,

Peace hath her victories,
No less renowned than war.

In this time of peace let us guard against political dangers. Let us resist every form of danger from whatever quarter it comes. Let us strive more for the welfare of the Republic than for the dominance of any political party. Once more let us say with Rufus Choate, "We join ourselves to no party that does not carry the flag and keep step to the music of the Union." Once more with the immortal Lincoln: "This nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

With tenderness, appreciation and affection I appeal to you, veterans, to serve your country and your God in peace as loyally as you did in war; to you, sons and daughters of veterans, that you strive to be worthy of your honored sires; to you, boys of the brigade, that you grow up to be strong men for God and your native land. Be of the number of those who like the soldiers in David's army could keep rank, those who had one heart for truth, purity, patriotism and godliness. As I close, I ring out the words of the brave and matchless Apostle Paul, praying that the spirit of all truth may enable you to apply them in every relation of life: Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." And may God grant that when you are all mustered out from the ranks of earthly heroes and heroines you may be crowned with immortal glory in heaven as good soldiers and as triumphant victors through the strength of Christ, the Captain of our salvation.

THE CHRISTIAN SOLDIER'S HYMN.

In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a reader in Maine asked whether some other reader could not supply the missing verses of a poem written by a drum-major, part of which the inquirer quoted from memory. Mrs. E. M. Strow of Wooster, O., sends the poem entire, but cannot find the name of the author. It is as follows:

A SOLDIER, Lord, thou hast me made,
Though art my Captain, King and Head.
And under thee I still would fight,
The fight of faith all in thy sight.
The Cross all stained with hallowed blood
The ensign of our cause in God.
The Soldier's heavenly standard is
And I will fight for King Jesus.

Grant me the arrows of thy word,
Thy Spirit's powerful two-edged sword,
To slay my foes where'er they be
And own the victory, won by thee,
That I a dutious child may be
To stand and fight the enemy.
And when the alarm's to "Call the Lord!"
May pass the word unto the guard.

Thou art my guard, keep me I pray
That I may walk the narrow way;
Nor from my duty e'er depart,
But live to Christ with all my heart.
Help me to keep my guardian dress
And march to the right with holiness:
Oh! make me pure and spotless, too,
And fit to stand the grand review.

And when our General he has come,
With sound of trumpet, not with drum,
'Tis then our well-dressed ranks shall stand
In full review, at God's right hand.
It's then the enemy'll get the rout,
And be wheeled by him to the left about;
Then we'll march on, up heavenly street,
And ground our arms at Jesus' feet.

PITY

AH! the thought
That God, the ever-blessed,
When he is truly sought,
Doth dwell in human breast.
And there impart
Both light and love,
With hope of heaven
As home above.

May I this thought receive:
That he may come to me,
And in me, daily live,
From sin to set me free:
And to impart
Both light and love,
The foretaste sweet,

ANTICHRIST'S ASCENDANCY.

How the Last World Ruler will Gain his Power Over the Ten Allied Kings.

BY REV. W. WHEELER.*

DANIEL'S reference to the events connected with the development of Antichrist (Daniel 11: 20), is more clear in the Revised Version than in the Authorized. It reads, "Then shall stand up in his place one that shall cause an exactor to pass through the glory of the kingdom; but within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle." The question is—Is this "One" of the twentieth verse the Syrian King who will be confederated with nine others when the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy has been first formed? because there would seem to be an historical break between the nineteenth and twentieth verses. The Turkish power appears to set forth typically the character of this new but short-lived Ruler, for Turkey has always been noted for its tax-gathering propensities. Also, the "glory of the Syrian kingdom" would be undoubtedly the land of of Palestine, rising as it is at the present time, with its railways, commerce, and agriculture, the improved condition of the architecture of its towns, and especially the City of Jerusalem, which is also reported as becoming more and more Jewish. Truly a rich field for a raiser of taxes! God in his providence, will see fit to remove him. It would follow almost as a natural course, if this King of Syria died soon after the formation of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, that the Prince, who previously had made a covenant with the Jews, would seek his place or office. It is remarkable that the Jewish "prince of the covenant" is named in the twenty-second verse, and "the league" in the twenty-third, as though the covenant were already in existence. This suggests the possibility of a Napoleon making a Seven Years' Covenant while only a Prince, but occupying some responsible position. The "Vile" or "Contemptible" Person to whom "they had not given the honor of the kingdom" is said to come in peaceably, and to obtain the kingdom by flatteries. We read, "He shall come in a time of security." That would surely be "a time of security." when ten kings had confederated together, and they would most likely be glad that the throne of the departed Syrian king should be occupied as quickly as possible.

The support of the nine kings would more than outweigh any lack of interest manifested among the Syrian people; and the princely applicant or aspirant will lure them by flatteries. He would be little at first in general estimation in comparison with his predecessor and of the other nine kings in the Confederacy—but he would rise rapidly into power, and become eventually monarch of them all—first conquering three kings; probably the Turkish, Greek, and Egyptian, so that with the kingdom of Syria already possessed, he would appear as a second Alexander the Great ruling over the four revived Eastern kingdoms, even as Alexander the Great did, and which were afterwards divided between his four generals. Dan. 11: 40, deals with him as supreme head of ten kings, as seen in Rev. 13, and hints at rebellion on the part of the Syrian and Egyptian Rulers at the time of the end of the time of trouble.

Some have thought that the King of the North in this verse refers to the supreme head of the Russian Empire, but there seems no reason why any departure should be made from the generally-received view that it refers to Syria's Ruler. Beside, he is to "enter into the countries," i. e., those represented by the kings of the North and the South—and is to "overflow and pass through" them. Egypt will particularly receive punishment (verses 42 and 43.) It would be more difficult to understand these words if one of the powers were the vast one of Russia, and the other that of England. The tidings of verse 44 might certainly hail from Russia as well as from the East, where the tribes of the children of Israel are supposed to be.

If the tidings out of the North come from Russia, then Ezekiel 38 and 39 would seem to intimate that by his diplomacy he will convert a threatened enemy into an ally, and so cause a meeting of forces around Jerusalem, as assuredly there will be on the occasion of the battle of Armageddon, for Zechariah 14: 2, says, "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle." And with such mighty forces surrounding him from all the nations of the earth, he plants "the tent of his palace between the sea and the glorious holy mountain, Yet in spite of his great power we are assured "he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." (Rev. 19: 11-21.)

TO LEGISLATE FOR THE CHURCH.

The Questions Before the 105th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.

A SPECIAL interest, not confined to the Church immediately concerned, attaches to the meetings of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which commenced on May 18, in Washington, D. C.

This is the one hundred and fifth General Assembly, and it has only once before convened in Washington. That was in 1852, and it was a very much smaller gathering than that of this year. The church has grown enormously in numbers as well as in wealth and influence during the forty-one years which have elapsed, and the conditions have greatly changed. At the Assembly of 1852, the subjects of public interest were very different from those of to-day, and the Assembly was affected by them. Dr. Albert Barnes preached the moderator's sermon, and his utterances on the question of slavery were those which most agitated his hearers. This year theological questions are to the fore.

Three subjects, besides the ordinary routine business, were to occupy the attention of the Assembly and many prayers have been offered all over the land that the Commissioners might be divinely guided in dealing with them. Most prominent of the three, was the appeal of the prosecutors of Professor Briggs of Union Theological Seminary of New York, against the decision of the Presbytery which acquitted him. The second, which grew out of the first, was the definition of the powers of the Assembly in relation to the Theological Seminaries. The third subject was the revision of the confession of faith, which was made by a committee appointed for the purpose, and had been submitted to the Presbyteries. A vote of two-thirds of the Presbyteries was necessary to its adoption, and as that proportion was not obtained in its favor, it remained for the General Assembly to decide whether a new revision should be attempted, or the old Confession remain undisturbed as the creed of the church. There are practically the same parties arrayed against each other on all three questions. The Commissioners who would vote in favor of acquitting Professor Briggs, would also vote together on the other two questions, though in the matter of revision they would have the assistance of allies who would not be on their side on the Briggs question. It is the old partition of Conservatives and Liberals which exists in politics, and social questions as in theology. The liberalism of the advanced section in the church, however, has many degrees. In respect to the creed it manifests itself in a desire to moderate its Calvinism. As it stands at present the creed states the doctrines of predestination and election in terms so harsh as to offend the feelings of those who delight to dwell on the character of God as one of infinite love. Some have abandoned Calvinism altogether and would feel relieved if it were altogether eliminated from the creed.

Included in this party, but by no means embracing all its members, is that advanced section of which Prof. Briggs is one of the leaders. Its members carry their liberalism far beyond Calvinism to the Bible itself. They hold that although the Bible contains the word of God, and is the supreme rule of faith and practice, it also contains an admixture of human writing which is not infallible, or, as they phrase it, inerrant. They also hold that the reason and the church are "fountains of divine authority" and that there is progressive sanctification after death. Prof. Briggs is the spokesman of this party and it rests with the Assembly to decide whether such doctrines are contrary to the creed of the Presbyterian Church. Incidental to this question is the second one previously referred to, whether it ought not to become possible for the General Assembly to prevent any man of whose doctrines it disapproves, holding the position of a [illegible] the students are trained for the ministry. These three questions have been referred to the Assembly as the supreme authority.

The first trial of strength between the two parties in the Assembly took place on the [illegible] it responsibility, as its functions are not confined to the rulings from the chair, but include the appointment of Committees which [illegible] Only two candidates were balloted for. They [illegible] University of Chicago, and Dr. George A. Baker, of Philadelphia. The first ballot was [illegible] Dr. Baker 198. Dr. Craig was described by a [illegible] tive and his election by so large a majority is accepted as an indication of the attitude of the Assembly on the questions before it.

YOUTH FOR CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 11 Eccles. 12: 1; II Timothy 3: 15; I. Timothy 4: 12.

HOW few persons in middle life or old age there are, who if they had the opportunity of living the past years over again, would live them in the same way! Of that small number almost all are those who have consecrated their lives in early youth to Christ's service. Scarcely any, even of those who have been successful, feel that they have acted wisely when they have given their years to the acquisition of money or power. They may boast of their success, and pride themselves on being self-made men, but in their hearts they are conscious that they might have put their time to better use. Brought into contact with men whose spiritual nature has grown and developed, as it always does when Christ has it in his keeping, the successful worldling feels that his rewards are exterior to himself and are not to be compared to those which are within a man. The peace, the content, the hope of eternal bliss, which fill the heart of an aged Christian and render him indifferent to his surroundings, contrast all to his advantage with the condition of a man who is dependent for his happiness on his keeping the treasure for which he has labored. Then, when the end comes, the exterior prize must be left behind, while he who has lived for spiritual attainment goes out into the future endowed with all that he has won.

But may not both ends be attained? There are two ways of making the experiment. One is to enjoy the world and to work for its prizes in youth, with the intention of repenting and readjusting the life in middle age, after the world's prizes have been won. The other way is to become a Christian and engage in Christian work, and contribute to religious enterprises, but to live on worldly principles strenuously seeking wealth and wordly honor during the week and giving the Sunday to God. Both schemes are popular and with the common idea of what constitutes salvation of the soul, both may be successful. The first is of course attended by the risk of death coming before the intended change has been made and also by the inability to make the change when the time arrives at which it was to be made. The second scheme is frequently spoiled by the preponderance of the worldly element over the spiritual, the latter dying of inanition. But both schemes will be rejected by one who has the true conception of salvation. To escape perdition and to enter heaven "so as by fire" is not the salvation which Christ would have us seek. He would have us seek to be delivered from the power of the flesh, to live after the spirit, to sacrifice and subordinate every inclination, every occupation, every motive to the one supreme aim of becoming like him, having his spirit and living his life. That can only be done by early consecration of the life to Christ. There is no prospect of the spiritual development which is set before us as the true end of life, unless it is commenced in youth before the soul becomes "spotted from the world" and before its powers are maimed by sin.

A NEW ENGLAND Y. M. C. A.

ONE of the most thriving Associations of smaller towns of New England is that of Burlington, Vt., a picture of whose building appears on this page. Though Burlington has a population of less than 20,000 its association has 770 members, a ladies' auxiliary of 150 members and a boys' department with a membership of 167. It is doubtful if any town of its size in America or indeed the whole world has so large and so aggressive an institution of the kind. Probably a part of its success is due to its vicinity, as 150 students of the Vermont University are on its roll of members. The Association is remarkable also for the prominence it gives to religious work, which in some other institutions of the same name which might be mentioned has unhappily been subordinated to athletics. During the past year forty-three associate members have been led to Christ in the meetings and have joined Christian churches in the town.

THE BURLINGTON, VT., Y. M. C. A. BUILDING.

The building is in all respects worthy of the association. It occupies a site eighty-one feet long by one hundred and fourteen wide and cost with its furniture $105,000. It rents the ground floor in four stores and uses all the remainder of the spacious edifice for its work. It has an excellent library and reading room and a large well-equipped gymnasium forty-four by fifty-five feet, with a suspended running track. The Association has just celebrated its twenty-seventh birthday, having been organized, May 28th, 1866.

TWO NOTABLE CONFERENCES

THE New York City and Brooklyn Christian Endeavor Societies held their usual Spring conferences on May 18 and 19. The New York Societies met in the Madison Avenue Reformed Church where they received a cordial welcome from the Rev. Abbot E. Kittredge. W. F. Stevens of the Church of the Disciples presided at the Conference of the Look-out Committees; J. R. Wray of the Reformed Presbyterian Church took charge of the Prayer Meeting Committees, and Charles Caldwell of the Social Committees. An earnest address was given by Miss Elizabeth Wishard of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and Miss Margaret Russell spoke on Sunday School work. Mr. W. E. George presided at the Junior rally. Dr. Howard Duffield, the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, delivered an inspiring address which none of the members are likely soon to forget.

The Conference of the Brooklyn Societies was held in the Church of the Pilgrims and the great edifice was filled to overflowing with the members. Dr. R. S. Storrs, the pastor of the Church welcomed the Conference and spoke in strong terms of the blessing Christian Endeavor had been to the whole city. The Secretary, Mr. W. W. Freeman, announced that there are now 115 Christian Endeavor Societies in the city, with an aggregate membership of over seven thousand. He said: "Twelve different denominations are represented in our inter denominational fellowship. The Presbyterians have hitherto led the other denominations in point of numbers, but they have always been closely followed by their Congregational brethren and, notwithstanding the fact that a year ago the Presbyterians were three Societies in advance and that they have since added several new Societies, they have been overtaken in the race and the Congregationalists now, lead, with twenty-two Societies, while the Presbyterians are second, having but one Society less, and the Baptists third with fifteen Societies." Among the speakers were: Dr. John Humpstone, of Emmanuel Baptist Church; Dr. A. Z. Conrad, of Worcester, Mass.; Gen. O. O. Howard, of the U. S. Army, and Rev. Henry W. Sherwood, President of the New York State Conference.

AN AGGRESSIVE LEAGUE.

THREE days of hearty enthusiastic work have been passed by the Epworth Leagues of the Spokane Wash. district in their first annual convention. The business was conducted in an expeditious and orderly manner and left time for some really effective and vigorous addresses from the pastors and officers. The election resulted in the appointment of the following list of district officers: President, M. H. Marvin of Pullman; Vice-Presidents, S. E. Cole of Moscow, Mrs. L. M. Sullivan of Colfax; Treasurer, Mrs. Cogswell of Rockford; Secretary, W. S. Buck of Spokane; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Ollie Miller of Colfax; to represent the League in national convention, Rev. V. E. Claypool of Pullman, Rev. W. T. Euster of Colfax. On Sunday, the closing day of the convention, the bell rang at 5.30 P.M. for an early morning consecration meeting. After the old-fashioned love feast at 9.30 A.M. and the Sunday School at 10.15 the church was filled to overflowing, and Dr. McInturf of Eugene, Ore., delivered an eloquent sermon. In the afternoon a large and attentive congregation greeted the members of the Junior League. Miss Clara Gutzler of Spokane, and Mrs. Cogswell of Rockford, gave excellent addresses, relative to the work of the Junior League

In the evening the consecration meeting was led by Rev. W. T. Euster of Colfax, and in the evening Dr. McInturf again preached to a large congregation. An hour of prayer and praise service followed when the meeting dissolved, and the first convention of the Epworth League of the district adjourned.

THE GENERAL OUTLOOK.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Chester, England, have united in holding a series of Evangelistic services in the city. Mr. Henry Thorne was engaged to conduct them, the C. E. Societies paying all expenses and actively assisting the work.

Intelligence has been received of the successful working of the Y.M.C.A. at Hobart, Tasmania, where Mr. Herbert Fairfax, late of Brisbane, has become general secretary. The work is chiefly spiritual, and is carried on by a young and energetic band of members, whose mission efforts have recently been greatly owned of God.

The Central Traffic Association of Chicago has granted the concession of one fare for the round trip to the National Convention of Baptist Young Peoples Unions at Indianapolis, July 12-17.

Mr. McCann, the Y. M. C. A. missionary secretary, sent to India by the English National Council, has taken an extensive tour amongst the towns of the Bombay presidency, helping forward existing work for young men, and, where possible, inaugurating fresh effort in their behalf. At the recent annual meeting of the Bombay Y. M. C. A. it was stated that the gross membership numbers 570, and the receipts more than cover the expenditure.

In Palestine Valleys.

They Now Resound to the Whistle of the Locomotive—The Old Style of Travel and the New as Orientals View Them.

IF the spirits of the Israelitish patriarchs or the doughty warriors of the Maccabbean period, were privileged to revisit, even for an hour, the scenes of their earthly struggles, joys and triumphs, what strange sights they would see! Our illustration on this page, shows one of the stations on the Jaffa and Jerusalem railway, at a village called Batteer, where the engines stop for water. Batteer is situated in a plain and is peopled by some 300 or 400 Moslems. It is in the midst of a grain-growing section where excellent crops of wheat, barley, lentiles, white corn and sesame are raised. But beyond the fact that it has been selected as a midway halting-place for the first railway ever built in Palestine, it has no claims to consideration. Yet those hills that now wear an aspect of bleak solitude, and the valleys where no sound is heard save the sighing of the wind amid the waving grain, until the clatter and shriek of the locomotive break the stillness, once resounded to the tread of armed hosts, and gave back echoes of deadly conflict. Every mile of the new railway traverses historic ground; the sites of battle-fields or of cities long since vanished.

The Jaffa-Jerusalem railway has already been fully described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the three and a-half hours' ride between the two cities has become a familiar experience to many who, until last year, were accustomed to perform the journey on camels. The road has five engines, all made in Philadelphia. The cars, which were constructed in France, are open at both ends, and the compartments are divided by partitions and doors. Two hundred tons of coal from Wales and Belgium are consumed per day. Most of the stone work, the cutting through hills, laying walls to support embankments, and dressing stone for stations and bridges, (like that shown in the photograph), was done by workmen from Bethlehem and the neighboring village of Beit Jala. Their ancestors were stone cutters in ancient times. Arab workmen from the plains received thirty to thirty-five cents per day, and Egyptians forty to fifty cents per day, while the skilled men who could work in stone received from seventy cents to one dollar per day. Out of this meagre allowance the men had to supply their own food.

This line of road, which would be accounted a very insignificant affair anywhere else, has already begun to exert a powerful influence on the commercial and social life of Palestine. Of its fifty-three miles of rail, thirty stretch across the plains and the remainder wind through mountain gorges and rocky defiles. There is not a single tunnel, the builders preferring to go around such bluffs as were encountered rather than bore through them. Now that the natives have overcome their repugnance to patronizing the innovation introduced by "the Franks" they take very kindly to riding on the cars and are rapidly beginning to realize that the railroad is a great improvement on the old camel-back method of locomotion, with its slow progress, and its liability to robbers and like misadventures. They therefore regard the dollar spent in fare as well invested. Formerly, in certain winter months, the journey from Jaffa to the Holy City was dangerous, the roads being almost impassable, especially for laden animals. Now, merchandise can be conveyed at all seasons, and the camel-drivers and dragomen are the only sufferers.

It is amusing to listen to a group of natives discussing the new road and the "smartness" of the "people of the West." Among the more ignorant there is still an impression that the men who make great bodies, such as engines and steamers, go without the help of human hands, are in league with spirits; the power of steam is not credited. But the road has already done much to open the eyes of Palestine and to rouse its people from their long sleep. Ere many years elapse, they may fully understand that the great world and its interests are very different from what they have imagined.

The Love Power.

STANDING around the death-bed of a faithful old wife and mother were her husband and eight grown-up sons and daughters, writes Rev. E. C. Norton in The Ram's Horn. One of them said, "We have the best mother in the world!" The reply came faintly back, "You never told me that before."

Love remembers everything. She never keeps a memorandum book, or ties a string around her finger in order that she may remember her promise or her desire. The mother of a large family never counts her children and she always knows the birthday of each one of them. A little girl who had just returned from her father's funeral, said, "Papa has such a lovely grave! You know he never could bear to sleep in a room without a light, and now one of the cemetery lamps will shine on his grave all the night long." Love remembered all the father's need.

Love forgets everything—every slight and unkind word; every favor she gives and every loan she makes. A gray-haired mother who had suffered for years on account of a dissipated son, had the joy of seeing him become a Christian. One night he told his experience to the congregation and confessed his cruelty toward her who gave him life. When the meeting was over, she put her arms around his neck and said, "How could you say you were so wicked, dear? You have been very good to me all your life." She had forgotten the pain he had caused her and all his sins. So love will forget ours.

MOTHER-LOVE.

COMFORTING childish sorrows,
And charming the childish heart
With the simple song and story,
Told with a mother's art.

And often when ready to murmur
That life is flitting away,
With the self-same round of duties
Filling each busy day.

It comes to our spirit sweetly,
With the grace of a thought divine:
"Ye are living, toiling for love's sake,
And the loving should ne'er repine."

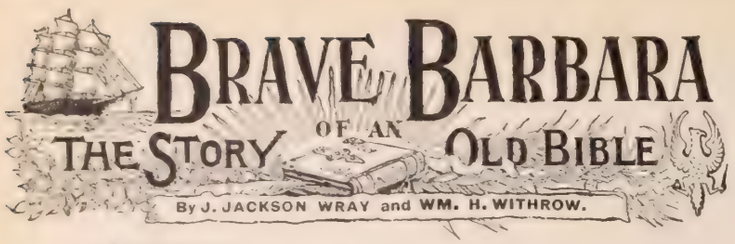
"THE KINGDOM" IN THE HOME

BOYS and girls, if you are going to be Christians, be Christians and not as your grandmothers, writes Professor Drummond. A grandmother has to be a Christian as a grandmother, and that is the right and the beautiful thing for her; but if you cannot read your Bible by the hour as your grandmother can, or delight in meetings as she can, don't think you are necessarily bad. When you are your grandmother's age you will have your grandmother's kind of religion. Meantime, be a Christian as a boy. Do the straight thing; seek the kingdom of righteousness and honor and truth. Keep the peace with those about you, and be filled with the joy of being a loyal, and simple, and natural servant of Jesus.

You can very easily tell a house, or a workshop, or an office where the kingdom of God is not. The first thing you see in that place is that the "straight thing" is not always done. Customers do not get fair play. You are in danger of learning to cheat and to lie. Better, a thousand times, to starve than to stay in a place where you cannot do what is right.

Or, when you go into your workshop, you find everybody sulky, touchy and ill-tempered, everybody at daggers drawn with everybody else, some of the men not on speaking terms with the others, and the whole feel of the place miserable and unhappy. The kingdom of God is not there, for it is peace. It is the kingdom of the devil that is anger, wrath and malice.

If you want to get the kingdom of God into your workshop, or into your home, let the quarreling be stopped. Live in peace and harmony and brotherliness with everyone. For the kingdom of God is a kingdom of brothers. It is a great Society, founded by Jesus Christ, of all the people who try to live like him, and to make the world better and sweeter and happier. Wherever a boy is trying to do that, in the house or in the street, in the workshop or on the baseball field, there is the kingdom of God. And everyone, however small or obscure or poor, who is seeking that, is a member of it. You see now, I hope, what the kingdom is.



CHAPTER XII.

A NEW SETTLEMENT.

WE have now done, in this veracious story of Brave Barbara, with war and conflict, and all the sore restlessness and loss and sorrow which had befallen her by the quarrels that had reddened the land with blood. The days of hardship and struggle came to an end at last. The noble Methodist pioneer, who had carried the banner of Immanuel, so long and so bravely, into the very thick of a hand-to-hand fight for Gospel truth, was about to be brought out of war and storm, and into a land of rest.

To each "United Empire Loyalist," as the people were called who preferred to live in Canada under the English flag than to stay in the new Republic, was assigned a free grant of two hundred acres of virgin land, as also to each child, even to those who were born after immigration, on their coming of age. Each settler received a supply of tools, such as axes, ploughs, hoes, spades, and other needful implements for farming use. And so the wilderness soon began to give place to smiling farms, thriving settlements, and waving fields of grain. We must turn now, to trace more minutely the fortunes of the principal characters of my story, bringing back again some of those with whom we were made familiar at the beginning of this history, and showing how Brave Barbara proved herself still a Gospel pioneer, a prophetess, a heroine, a splendid specimen of womanhood in the days to come as in the days gone by.

Before we pass on to relate the last and crowning chapters in the history of this remarkable woman and brave pioneer of the great Methodist movement in the Far West, we must take one final glance at the career of our little batch of peasant Palatines, before they completed their experiences as citizens and co-workers with God in the sorely-tried, and subsequently prosperous city of Montreal.

Both Paul Heck and John Lawrence, who had "done the State some service" in the times of war, were honestly remembered by the military and civil authorities of the city in time of peace; and both of them might have done well for themselves and their belongings, if they would have "taken service with the king," and joined the army corps in some of its departments. For a little while the uncompromising Paul did earn good wages in doing military carpentering, repairing the furniture and strengthening the wood-work of the citadel. But when he was set to the uncongenial task of making gun-carriages and other implements of war, his soul rebelled. He had "taken service with" the greater King, had joined the army corps whose only battle-cry is "love," and whose colors are "the white flower of a blameless life."

"No, no," said he to Colonel Featherstone, who held him in great esteem, and was doing his best to get him always under his employ, "I keep asking myself the question, 'What would the Man Christ Jesus do if he were in my place?' and I don't believe that he would ever fire off a rifle or use a sword. What he wouldn't do, his servant has no right to do."

John Lawrence, as we have already seen, did not read his New Testament in the same sense. John saw big wages and much patronage before him, and was half minded to listen to the charms of the Colonel and enter the permanent service of Government House. He dearly hoped to take Mary Embury to his heart and hearth, and this would secure him and her a luxurious house and home; for John was clever above the common, and was "sure to rise." So he made Barbara Heck his counsellor, and submitted his plans to her, and asked her to use her influence with Mary to get her to "name the day."

"I'll do nothing of the sort, John Lawrence. I love her too well for that and I think far too well of you, both as a Christian friend and a Methodist brother, to advise you to have anything more to do either with a soldier's life or soldier labor. If your heart hankers after the flesh-pots of military promotion, why, so let it be, but leave Mary Embury alone. I believe she would marry you, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ; but if you desert your captain and 'take service' on the other side, or try the pitiful policy of serving both masters, she'll say, 'No,' John, as sure as you are born—and serve you right!"

Once more Brave Barbara won a conquest for Jesus and the right. As a plain artisan, content for the time to earn small wages, and toiling hard for the little Methodist church of which he was the unsalaried pastor, honest John Lawrence proposed to the blooming young widow whom he had loved through long years; was accepted; and through a long life these two, sternly tried and strongly tested as they had been, served their Master, their generation, and each other, according to the will of God and dwelt in more honor, happiness, and peace, than usually falls to human lot.

Soon after the wedding, the Hecks and the Lawrences determined to escape from city life, to which circumstances had condemned them, and which had never been a matter of choice through all these arduous years. They longed again for the free peasant life of the wilderness. The pursuits of agriculture and the employment of the farm and the clearing were dear to them as ever, and their eyes were longingly turned to the fertile and virgin regions of Ontario, where new settlements were being formed in the heart of the wilderness.

"United Loyalists" from across the border were coming thither in great numbers. Among these were many old friends and acquaintances from their old homes by the Hudson River, even from the slopes of Munster and the farms of Ballygarane. Aided by the Government, Paul Heck and John Lawrence were enabled to join the new settlers, receiving free grants of land, not only as others had done, but receiving also special treatment both of land and means in recognition of service.

It was not without sincere regrets that Barbara and her companions bade farewell to their many kind, true friends at Montreal; especially was this true of the Lafarges, of Col. Featherstone and the few red-coats in the garrison who had become fellow pilgrims to Canaan, and joined the Methodist community worshiping in the bakery of Jean Baptiste Lafarge. At a tender leave-taking there, Brave Barbara, her husband, and the young pastor Lawrence, commended their old comrades to the care of the Great Master.

"As for us," said Brave Barbara, "we go forth as we have had to do many times before, like Abraham, not knowing whither we go. But I have faith to believe that this will prove to be my last removal, and that God will give us a home, and our seed after us. Many changes I have seen; very great, and some of them very sad. But I have always felt that the hand of the Lord was with us, and that he had something for us to do for the cause and kingdom of our Lord Jesus. Now, I and mine are going, at the bidding of our good and gracious Master, to seek a quiet resting-place, and a grave among my children and my children's children."

These words were prophetic. She is now sleeping her last sleep among her kinsfolk after the flesh, for to this day her name is held in reverence and honor by those of her blood and name. As for her spiritual kinsfolk, the great Methodist community, they are scattered far and wide through all the land.

At Lachine, a little way above the rapids, the little company embarked anew their store of household gear and their new stock of implements for the farm, in a fleet of stout bateaux. These were handled by Paul Heck, John Lawrence, and their invaluable and happy helper, Lucky Mike. On board the boats were snugly housed Brave Barbara and her three bright lasses—two sisters of these had found a resting-place in the graveyard of Montreal. With Barbara was Mary Lawrence, now a happy wife, and her daughter Pollie, who found in her new father nothing but a dearly beloved friend in closer relation than before.

The two sturdy lads of Paul Heck, aged respectively nineteen and twenty-one, and young Philip Embury, who had also passed his 'teens, walked all the distance alongside the river bank, slowly driving before them the cows and horses which were to stock the farms in the new land which was to provide them with hearth and home, in which the youthful heirs of a noble heritage were to build for themselves also an honorable name.

The animals the lads thus conducted to their appointed place were detained at certain points of their long journey, in order to haul the laden boats up the rapids of the river. Night after night our voyagers drew up the bateaux, and pitched their tents in the shadow of the primeval forest. After the homely evening meal had been discussed, and the rough blankets had been spread, Barbara read out from the dear familiar old German Bible, some of the Psalms of David, or some portion from the life-story of him who had not where to lay his head.

At last, after many days of toil, and many nights of hope deferred, these pioneers of civilization reached the forest lands allotted to them by the Government. The whole district had been surveyed by the Colonial authorities, and the town of Augusta (that was to be), was roughly mapped out. Their future farms lay on a beautiful, broad upland slope, at the foot of which the St. Lawrence flowed with stately march. To-day, the thriving village of Maitland nestles on the very spot, amid green bowers and fertile fields, and alive with happy and prosperous rural life. At that time, however, it was a wilderness, almost untrodden by the foot, untouched by the hand of man.

Our immigrants were easily able to find the plots apportioned to them, by the trees which had been "blazed" by the surveyors' axes, and which bore the initial letter of their names. Their tents were pitched under the giant trees of the forests; the boats were unloaded; the fires were kindled; and in the long twilight—it was now early spring-time—the united party found once more a place of rest. They ate their bread in their new home, if home it could be called, while not as yet a tree was felled, or yet a roof-tree raised.

The first thing they did after that was, like the patriarch, Jacob at Bethel, to erect an altar and worship the God of their fathers, the Redeemer, who had led them through all the turns of their life-journey, under the lofty vault of the forest cathedral. Once again the old German Bible was reverently laid on the lap of Brave Barbara, and as her fingers were laid lovingly on the beloved pages, she led the happy and hopeful, though weary group, in their devotions.

Then, in their solitary lodge in the vast wilderness, they slept, camped in the invisible pavilion, in which the true Israel of God are safe tenanted however low they lie, however open to the winds of heaven. I have no space to tell of the busy, laborious and exciting days that followed. Day after day, the keen axes rang through the woods. Men, women, and children alike, found pleasant pastime in arduous toil, for their heart was in their labor; home was rising round them and overhead; how well they knew it—God was their covenanted Friend and Father. The monarchs of the forest were felled to earth, and soon lay, cut in log lengths on the sward. Strong hands and brave hearts built the first rude log-houses; the younger children gathered moss to stuff the chinks to keep out the wind and weather; the women and stout-hearted lasses in their teens speedily gave the interior of the rough walls that home look which only women's fingers can; and when, at last, the little cluster of house-cabins, cow-sheds, barns and other erections were completed, the whole hamlet was called "Ballygarane," and while the youngsters listened with brightening eyes, the eyes of the elders filled with tears as the story was told of the old home in "dear ould Ireland" far across the sea which none of them could ever forget.

While these rude erections were still proceeding, our emigrants found time at intervals to turn the rich alluvial soil with surface plough and harrow, and prepare for the harvest time, which would soon come on apace. They could not afford to let those spring days pass by, even though the comfortable shelter of a roof-tree be deferred, lest winter should find them with empty barns.

As will be understood by my readers, from the beginning of things at "New Ballygran," Lord's Day was never broken in upon by any "works of necessity," which have become so sadly numerous in these days. When the bateaux was being unladen, Saturday eve arrived, while yet their goods and gear were half on board and half on shore, and it seemed all but impossible to compass any sleeping arrangement, without continuing their labors right through the Lord's Day.

One brief whisper to that effect from one of Paul Heck's eldest lads, was quite enough to settle that question once for all.

"No, no, my boy. Let come of it what will," said the brave and faithful Barbara. Our King shall have his own day all to himself; for not only has he given us "six days wherein" to do all we have to do, and kept but one for himself, but truly, if we give that day to him, we get it back for ourselves; and moreover, it gives a double value to the other six!

So spake the Methodist mother in Israel, and the golden rule of the place, unbroken by lifted tool or questionable deed, was the law of New Ballygran and of the Maitland hamlet that followed it.

Before the first winter had arrived, the transformation in the settlement was simply wonderful. A wee and winsome hamlet of logs and shingles lay like a gem of civilization in the heart of the desert. The cattle were comfortably housed in well-roofed byres, the horses in cosy stables; and the corn of various kinds was safely piled in barn and granary. While the wintry wind howled without, the regular thud, thud, thud of the flail made music in the ears of those who wielded it, and these were John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan. The latter of whom was wont to declare that "Lucky Mike had been growin' luckier by degrees, barrin' an unlucky patch of soolderin'; but hevin' wance agin found his way to Ballygran, wi' Cushla-ma-cree to tak' care of, he had come to be luckiest av all!"

The winter at New Ballygran, was not by any means a rose-water sort of life; and our group of Methodist pioneers had experiences that needed all their religion to help them to come safely through. More than once or twice hostile Indians made raids upon their possessions; more than once or twice the ice in the river close by exploded like a burst cannon and startled them with fear of warlike attack.

For the prowling bear, and the wily and ferocious catamount, they needed to keep a sharp watch; and taking matters broadly it may be clearly understood that Brave Barbara and her comrades needed to be what we well know they were, brave, strong, hard-headed, and true; the very stuff that emigrants should be made of; and every one of these excellent virtues was made trebly strong, valiant, and successful because New Ballygran was a Theocracy, and its Monarch was Immanuel, the Wonderful, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace!

It is scarcely needful to say that in the midst of their secular labors, their daily round and common task, our little band of Palatines did not neglect their spiritual husbandry. With such a whole souled and hearty leader at their head as Paul Heck, and especially with such a living power in the centre of their family life as Brave Barbara, that was an impossibility. In a short space of time, even in that sparsely populated region, the Methodists of New Ballygran were known and honored, and believed in for many a mile around. Their neighbors'-neighbors, full twenty miles away, were free to testify to the truth of Solomon's dictum, "The righteous is more excellent than his neighbor," for they felt that Brave Barbara and her comrades presented a positive and unanswerable proof thereof.

Long before their own homestead had really become "home," they had commenced Sabbath services, and invited their widely-scattered neighbors to join them in the worship of Immanuel, their King. Their first service was out in the open-air, their second in their newly-roofed log cabin, and so the work went on. John Lawrence was regarded as "chief pastor," but Paul Heck and Brave Barbara, and even our home-spun humorist, Lucky Mike, took turn and turn about in talking to the willing hearers, who came for miles to listen to the "Good Word."

Philip Embury, son of the brave preacher who first held forth in the old sail loft in New York, was now a fine young fellow with a strong physique, and an equal mental vigor and strength of character to that which marked its former wearer. In due time, Philip came to be quite a notable citizen in the district which he helped to form out of this wilderness, a magistrate, and I know not what besides; but he could scarcely wear fairer and more enduring laurels than the part he took as the first class-leader in the great religious movement.

Among the members of the first Canadian class meeting, and standing at the head of the list are the names of Paul and Barbara Heck; and the names of their three sons are recorded on the same roll, and to-day wearers of those very names perpetuate the godly traditions of their worthy progenitors. It would seem likely enough that the house of Brave Barbara and her noble husband, like the house of Rechab, will never fail to have "a man to stand before the Lord."

Within six years William Losee, the first regular Methodist preacher, was appointed to the colony;, and so our heroine and the little group of pioneers around this true mother in Israel become the founders and pioneers of Methodism in upper Canada, as they had been in the United States.

THERE are lots of people who can't follow Christ. They haven't the "beautiful feet" spoken of in Isaiah. Still there's no trouble with them physically. The difficulty is, that they are dead in trespasses and sins. This command is not spoken to dead people.

"Follow me," said Christ, and here is the secret of all successful fishing. If we would simply take these two words and begin to attach all the importance to them, there were no need to write another word. But, because we're human as well as divine, the Lord has to be explicit, for he not only says "follow me," but he says "And I will make you fishers of men." And where he is explicit we may well be.

The necessity for hiding self often renders a cloudy day the best time for fishing. Days when the Lord has hid himself behind some cloud of sorrow, either from you or the soul sought. At such times you are shut up to naked faith for a knowledge of God and his love, or the soul fished for, realizing that he stands alone, stripped of earthly props, is therefore shut up to God. These are days for a great catch.

Does it strike you as strange that a line is used as an emblem of prayer, because the fishing line goes down into the dark, murky waters, whereas your conception of prayer has always been that it goes up! Well, when you're fishing, always remember that God's where the fish are, and the direction for prayer is to seek him among the fish.

"Where's my tackle?" Haven't you heard such a cry come down from the garret, from the lips of the man or the boy of the house to his mother or wife? "I haven't fished since last spring." There are lots of Christians who seem to think that there are seasons for soul fishing as distinct as those that the law fixes for piscatorial sport. They only fish during a revival. No wonder their hooks get rusty and their lines are snarled when they find them tucked away in some corner. Such people generally find their bait stale and dead, just as the Israelites found their manna spoiled if kept over from one day to another.

Go where the fish are. Yes, that's the next thing, but almost too self-evident to be mentioned. So one would think. But most Christians are doing almost anything else; expecting sinner fish to come to the church to be caught. But pshaw! such are not fishermen, after all; they're these sick-a-bed, half-alive Christians. The true fisherman knows where to go and goes.

THE BONDAGE OF DRINK.

W. E. PARRY, a city missionary, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "No man ever started to drink with the intention of ruining himself, bringing disgrace upon his family, staining his reputation, blasting his prospects, breaking the hearts of mother, sisters, and wife, and ruining himself both body and soul. When the young man took the first glass of wine from the hand of the sweet young lady who afterwards became his wife, neither he nor she knew that that glass would be the means of blasting that young life.

Little did that girl think then that she would have to spend whole nights in watching and waiting for the return of her husband, and then when he did come, he would be beastly drunk. She did not think then that she and her little children would have to suffer from cold and hunger because the husband and father was a drunkard. She did not know then that she would become a beggar, a disappointed, heart-broken, suffering woman. No, could she have had the future revealed to her, she would have acted quite differently.

"There is a family whom I have visited from time to time, who are now in deep distress. The husband is a drunkard, the wife is heart-broken,—what will become of them! The wife has borne with him for years, but instead of getting better, he only grows worse. One thing and another have been taken to the pawn-shop, until nothing much remains. I have prayed with and advised the wife, and in a few days, I learn, she is going to leave her husband and take her two little children to better quarters, where, if friends can be raised up, and work procured, she can live and earn her bread.

"I could name many once happy wives who, through their husbands' drinking, have become discouraged and are almost ready to destroy themselves. I know a man, who for years was a confirmed drunkard. Nine years ago, you might have see him walking up and down the Bowery; ragged, dirty, hair uncombed, face seldom washed; most of what he ate was stolen from the lunch counters. He slept in the lowest dens or under the doorsteps. One day, he wandered into a mission and was converted. For eight years he has been living a consistent, Christian life, has a fine business, owns a beautiful home, has a loving family around him and is a thorough Christian gentleman. THE TABERNACLE DEBT SETTLED.

Dr. Talmage Gratefully Thanks the Readers of "The Christian Herald"—Only a Few Minor Creditors Yet to be Paid

IT will be pleasant news for our readers to learn that, mainly through their generous efforts, the peril which threatened to engulf the Brooklyn Tabernacle has been averted. Though the magnanimity of those who held claims against the building in meeting the liquidators more than half-way, the money already raised has been found sufficient to wipe out the greater part of the floating debt, leaving only a few scattering claims. For these THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has given assurance of early settlement.

Elsewhere in this issue, Dr. Talmage over his own signature, sends a cordial message of thanks to his friends for their very timely and valuable aid in the present crisis of the Tabernacle's affairs, and the prominent part they have taken in the effort for redemption. Without their help, that effort would unquestionably have ended in failure. All moneys intended for the Fund must be mailed not later than next Saturday, June 3.

Is it modern, with all the improvements? In all sizes and styles for everybody; the new, quick-winding Waterbury?"

Yes—to everything. A prominent publisher writes:

"You made one additional customer, and my quick-winding Waterbury is a better time-keeper than a hundred-dollar watch a friend of mine bought some months ago."

Yet the cost ranges from $15 down to $4. It has a jeweled movement, and is cased in dainty chatelaines, hunting-cases, open-faces, filled gold, coin-silver, etc. Every jeweler sells it 38

Some Quaint Eastern Customs.

Bethlehem Souvenir Sellers and the Picturesque Street Venders of the Orient.

NO more significant monument of the vanished glories of the East exists than the traces of wondrous skill and cunning workmanship in its shrines, temples, palaces, and monuments. The West has never rivalled the marvelous craftsmanship of the Orient in gold, silver and stone, although it has eclipsed it in a thousand different ways through the later developments of science and mechanical skill. The delicate skill of the artificers in metals in Damascus and other Syrian cities is proverbial. Every traveler who has visited Palestine has been both surprised and delighted with the dainty souvenirs sold in almost every city and village, which the native artisans contrive to produce, with the most primitive sort of tools. Our illustration shows a group of souvenir venders—men of Bethlehem, which besides its supremely sacred associations, enjoys the distinction of being one of the most active and thriving industrial centres of Judea. For many years it has had a practical monopoly of the production of articles that are sold as souvenirs, and these were generally made of mother-of-pearl, olive wood, or bone. They have been prized as remembrances of the Holy Land by thousands of pilgrims.

The souvenir industry may be said to have originated with the natives of Bethlehem. Many Bethlehemites take large quantities of those keepsakes and transport them to merchants in every part of the world. France, Spain, Portugal and Italy are the chief markets where such goods can be sold at high prices, and the traffic in beads, crosses, card-cases, sleeve buttons, pen-holders and jewelry boxes is enormous. Many venders have made a fortune by this trade. The poorer class of souvenir sellers do not travel much, but content themselves with peddling about in the villages of Palestine, where the natives are very largely of the Christian faith. Others search out the Christians in Syria, Asia Minor, Central Turkey, and Mesopotamia,, as far as the Persian Gulf. Merchants of this class cannot pay a high rent for stores, so they live in hotels and restaurants. Even when they come to Damascus, Aleppo, Beyrouth, Bagdad, or Smyrna, they are not needlessly concerned about a place wherein to spread their merchandise, but they simply choose a spot in the shade where many people pass by. They put a straw mat or sack on the ground, and on it array their goods for exhibition and sale. They also go selling from house to house. It is not an unusual sight to see these merchants (as in the picture) seated in front of a church where the passengers are sure to be numerous, especially on Sundays, when everybody comes out for worship. In many places these venders are provided with a lodging and shelter by the church officials, who take special pleasure in welcoming Christian believers from the East, and thus in part repaying the hospitality they themselves may have enjoyed when traveling in Syria. Our photograph shows two souvenir sellers of the poorer class, sitting in the open court in front of some church in Akka, (the ancient Ptolemais), on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea and opposite Mount Carmel, which towers to the blue skies, eight miles to the south. The dealers have strung some of their wares across the court, while before them, upon a straw mat other articles are exposed for sale. Among them is a peculiar dried root which, when put in water for a few minutes, expands in the form of a hand. To this the natives have given the appellation of "The Virgin's Hand." A basket, a canvas bag and boxes are the receptacles for their wares, when not on exhibition.

As a rule, the Bethlehem trinket sellers are shrewd business men and know well how to drive a bargain and yet afford entire satisfaction to the pilgrim purchaser. They are famous linguists, too, and coming into contact with Europeans of many different nationalities, rapidly acquire a knowledge of any language sufficient for the purposes of their business. It is not unusual to find that among a small group of merchants, French, English, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and Russian are spoken in the ordinary course of an hour's dealings. Besides they invariably have at command a stock of miscellaneous information, just such as a traveler wants, and in their readiness to afford aid to strangers, they set an example of politeness and patience to the world.

BEAD AND SOUVENIR VENDERS OF BETHLEHEM.

From a Photograph secured in the Holy Land by the Rev. Dr. Talmage

In Jerusalem itself, one of the quaintest and most delightfully Oriental features is the seemingly endless variety of street and sidewalk merchant. The walls toward the Jaffa Gate, and in front of the citadel, where there is an open space, have long been favorite haunts of those humble tradesfolk. Some display their wares in booths; others simply spread mats on the ground and use them as a basis for a miscellaneous collection of articles of wood, metal, mother-of-pearl, or amber. Still others sit on low stools made of rushes, with baskets of lemons, figs, oranges, and raisins in front. Their costumes vary quite as much as their wares. Turbans are everywhere, though wide-brimmed hats and cloth caps are also worn, and the striped "abba" or overcoat peculiar to the East is the almost universal garment. It is amusing to observe the extremely dignified demeanor of many of these bearded and turbaned patriarchs, as they sit behind the few handfuls of withered figs or the little pile of oranges and lemons that constitute their entire stock-in-trade. No merchant prince, entrusted with the supplies of a great nation, could possibly administer his trust with more gravity or with a profounder sense of the importance of weights or measures.

As in Jerusalem, so in Damascus, the street venders no less than the bazaars are a source of interest to the visitor. Indeed, Damascus fairly rivals London and Paris in the multiplicity and picturesqueness of its street sights and scenes, for there nearly all trades are conducted out-of-doors. Workmen sit merrily hammering, cross-legged in turban or tarboosh; cooks compound all sorts of dishes; butchers, fruit-sellers, crockery-dealers, bakers, shoemakers—all in the open street. As these streets are frequently so narrow as to be mere lanes, the light that penetrates them is so dingy that a customer is at the mercy of the dealer, should the latter be disposed to misrepresent his wares or overreach the buyer.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

SCENE IN A SUMMER HOUSE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Judges 3: 15 "But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud, the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed."

EHUD was a ruler in Israel. He was left-handed and, what was peculiar about the tribe of Benjamin, to which he belonged, there were in it seven hundred left-handed men and yet, so dexterous had they all become in the use of the left hand, that the Bible says they could sling stones at a hair's breadth, and not miss.

Well, there was a king by the name of Eglon, who was an oppressor of Israel. He imposed upon them a most outrageous tax. Ehud, the man of whom I first spoke, had a divine commission to destroy that oppressor. He came, pretending that he was going to pay the tax, and asked to see King Eglon. He was told he was in the summer-house, the place to which the king retired when it was too hot to sit in the palace. This summer-house was a place surrounded by flowers, and trees, and springing fountains, and warbling birds. Ehud entered the summer-house, and said to King Eglon that he had a secret errand with him. Immediately all the attendants were waved out of the royal presence. King Eglon rises up to receive the messenger. Ehud the left-handed man, puts his left hand to his right side, pulls out a dagger, and thrusts Eglon through until the haft went in after the blade. Eglon falls. Ehud comes forth to blow a trumpet of recruit amidst the mountains of Ephraim; and a great host is marshalled, and proud Moab submits to the conqueror, and Israel is free. So, O Lord, let all thy enemies perish! So, O Lord, let all thy friends triumph!

I learn first, from this subject, the power of left-handed men. There are some men who, by physical organization, have as much strength in their left hand as in their right hand; but there is something in the writing of this text which implies that Ehud had some defect in his right hand, which compelled him to use the left. Oh, the power of left-handed men! Genius is often self-observant, careful of itself, not given to much toil, burning incense to its own aggrandizement; while many a man, with no natural endowments, actually defective in physical and mental organization, has an earnestness for the right, a patient industry, an all-consuming perseverance, which achieve marvels for the kingdom of Christ. Though left-handed as Ehud, they can strike down a sin as great and imperial as Eglon.

I have seen men of wealth gathering about them all their treasures, snuffing at the cause of a world lying in wickedness, roughly ordering Lazarus off their door-step, sending their dogs, not to lick his sores, but to hound him off their premises; catching all the pure rain of God's blessing into the stagnant, ropy, frog-inhabited pool of their own selfishness—right-handed men, worse than useless—while many a man, with large heart and little pulse, has, out of his limited means, made poverty leap for joy, and started an influence that overspans the grave, and will swing round and round the throne of God, world without end: Amen.

Ah me, it is high time that you left-handed men, who have been longing for this gift, and that eloquence, and the other man's wealth, should take your left hand out of your pockets. Who made all these railroads? Who set up all these cities? Who started all these churches, and schools, and asylums? Who has done the tugging, and running, and pulling? Men of no wonderful endowments, thousands of them acknowledging themselves to be left-handed, and yet they were earnest, and yet they were determined, and yet they were triumphant.

But I do not suppose that Ehud, the first time he took a sling in his left hand, could throw a stone a hair's breadth, and not miss. I suppose it was practice that gave him the wonderful dexterity. Go forth to your spheres of duty, and be not discouraged if, in your first attempts, you miss the mark. Ehud missed it. Take another stone, put it carefully into the sling, swing it around your head, take better aim, and the next time you will strike the centre. The first time a mason rings his trowel upon the brick, he does not expect to put up a perfect wall. The first time a carpenter sends the plane over a board, or drives a bit through a beam, he does not expect to make perfect execution. The first time a boy attempts a rhyme, he does not expect to chime a "Lalla Rookh," or a "Lady of the Lake." Do not be surprised if, in your first efforts at doing good, you are not very largely successful. Understand that usefulness is an art, a science, a trade.

There was an oculist performing a very difficult operation on the human eye. A young doctor stood by and said, "How easily you do that; it don't seem to cause you any trouble at all." "Ah," said the old oculist, "it is very easy now, but I spoiled a hatful of eyes to learn that." Be not surprised if it takes some practice before we can help men to moral eyesight, and bring them to a vision of the Cross. Left-handed men to the work! Take the Gospel for a sling, and faith and repentance for the smooth stone from the brook; take sure aim, God direct the weapon, and great Goliaths will tumble before you.

When Garibaldi was going out to battle, he told his troops what he wanted them to do, and after he had described what he wanted them to do, they said, "Well, general, what are you going to give us for all this?" "Well," he replied, "I don't know what else you will get, but you will get hunger, and cold, and wounds, and death. How do you like it?" His men stood before him for a little while in silence, and then they threw up their hands and cried, "We are the men! We are the men!" The Lord Jesus Christ calls you to his service. I do not promise you an easy time in this world. You may have persecutions, and trials, and misrepresentations; but afterward there comes an eternal weight of glory, and you can bear the wounds, and the bruises, and the misrepresentations, if you can have the reward afterward. Have you not enough enthusiasm to cry out, "We are the men! We are the men!"

I learn also from this subject the danger of worldly elevation. This Eglon was what the world called a great man. There were hundreds of people who would have considered it the greatest honor of their life just to have him speak to them; yet although he is so high up in worldly position, he is not beyond the reach of Ehud's dagger. I see a great many people trying to climb up in social position, having an idea that there is a safe place somewhere far above, not knowing that the mountain of fame has a top like Mont Blanc, covered with perpetual snow.

We laugh at the children of Shinar for trying to build a tower that could reach to the heavens; but I think, if our eyesight were only good enough, we could see a Babel in many a door-yard. Oh, the struggle is fierce! It is store against store, house against house, street against street, nation against nation. The goal for which men are running is chairs and chandeliers, and mirrors, and houses, and lands, and presidential equipments. If they get what they anticipate, what have they got? Men are not safe from calumny while they live, and, worse than that, they are not safe after they are dead; for I have seen swine root up graveyards. One day a man goes up into publicity, and the world does him honor, and people climb up into sycamore trees to watch him as he passes, and, as he goes along on the shoulders of the people, there is a waving of hats and a wild huzza. To-morrow the same man is caught between the jaws of the printing-press and mangled and bruised, and the very same persons who applauded him before cry, "Down with the traitor! down with him!"

Belshazzar sits at the feast, the mighty men of Babylon sitting all around him. Wit sparkles like the wine, and the wine like the wit. Music rolls up among the chandeliers, the chandeliers flash down on the decanters. The breath of hanging gardens floats in on the night air; the voice of revelry floats out. Amidst wreaths, and tapestry, and folded banners, a finger writes. The march of a host is heard on the stairs. Laughter catches in the throat. A thousand hearts stop beating. The blow is struck. The blood on the floor is richer-hued than the wine on the table. The kingdom has departed. Belshazzar was no worse, perhaps, than hundreds of people in Babylon, but his position slew him. Oh, be content with just such a position as God has placed you in. It may not be said of us, "He was a great general," or "He was an honored chieftain," or "He was mighty in worldly attainments;" but this thing may be said of you and me, "He was a good citizen, a faithful Christian, a friend of Jesus." And that in the last day will be the highest of all eulogiums.

I learn further from this subject that death comes to the summer-house. Eglon did not expect to die in that fine place. Amidst all the flower-leaves that drifted like summer snow into the window; in the tinkle and the dash of the fountains; in the sound of a thousand leaves fluttering on one tree-branch; in the cool breeze that came up to shake feverish trouble out of the king's locks—there was nothing that spake of death, but there he died! In the winter when the snow is a shroud, and when the wind is a dirge, it is easy to think of our mortality; but when the weather is pleasant, and all our surroundings are agreeable, how difficult it is for us to appreciate the truth that we are mortal! And yet my text teaches that death does sometimes come to the summer-house. He is blind and cannot see the leaves. He is deaf and cannot hear the fountains. Oh, if death would ask us for victims, we could point him to hundreds of people who would rejoice to have him come. Push back the door of that hovel. Look at that little child—cold, and sick, and hungry. It has never heard the name of God but in blasphemy. Parents intoxicated, staggering around its straw bed. Oh, Death, there is a mark for thee! Up with it into the light! Before these little feet stumble on life's pathway, give them rest.

Here is an aged man. He has done his work. He has done it gloriously. The companions of his youth are all gone, his children dead, he longs to be at rest, and wearily the days and the nights pass. He says, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Oh, Death, there is a mark for thee! Take from him the staff, and give him the sceptre! Up with him into the light, where eyes never grow dim, and the air whitens not through the long years of eternity. Ah, Death will not do that. Death turns back from the straw bed, and from the aged man ready for the skies, and comes to the summer-house. What doest thou here thou bony, ghastly monster, amidst this waving grass, and under this sunlight sifting through the tree-branches? Children are at play. How quickly their feet go, and their locks toss in the wind. Father and mother stand at the side of the room looking on, enjoying their glee. It does not seem possible that the wolf should ever break into that fold and carry off a lamb. Meanwhile an old archer stands looking through the thicket. He points his arrow at the brightest of the group—he is a sure markesman—the bow bends, the arrow speeds! Hush now! The quick feet have stopped, and the locks toss no more in the wind. Laughter has gone out of the hall. Death in the summer-house!

Here is a father in mid-life; his coming home at night is the signal for mirth. The children rush to the door, and there are books on the evening stand, and the hours pass away on glad feet. There is nothing wanting in that home. Religion is there, and sacrifices on the altar morning and night. You look in that household and say, "I cannot think of anything happier. I do not really believe the world is so sad a place as some people describe it to be." The scene changes. Father is sick. The doors must be kept shut. The death-watch chirps dolefully on the hearth. The children whisper, and walk softly where once they romped. Passing the house late at night, you see the quick glancing of lights from room to room. It is all over. Death in the summer-house!

Here is an aged mother—aged, but not infirm. You think you will have the joy of caring for her wants a good while yet. As she goes from house to house, to children and grandchildren, her coming is a dropping of sunlight in the dwelling. Your children see her coming through the lane, and they cry, "Grandmother's come!" Care for you has marked up her face with many a deep wrinkle and her back stoops with carrying your burdens. Some day she is very quiet. She says she is not sick, but something tells you, you will not much longer have mother. She will sit with you no more at the table, nor at the hearth. Her soul goes out so gently, you do not exactly know the moment of its going. Fold the hands that have done so many kindnesses for you right over the heart that has beat with love toward you since before you were born. Let the pilgrim rest. She is weary. Death in the summer-house!

Gather about us what we will of comfort and luxury, when the pale messenger comes, he does not stop to look at the architecture of the house before he comes in; nor, entering, does he wait to examine the pictures we have gathered on the wall; or, bending over your pillow, he does not stop to see whether there is a color in the cheek, or gentleness in the eye, or intelligence in the brow. But what of that? Must we stand forever mourning among the graves of our dead? No! No! The people in Bengal bring cages of birds to the graves of their dead, and then they open the cages, and the birds go singing heavenward. So I would bring to the graves of your dead all bright thoughts and congratulations, and bid them think of victory and redemption, I stamp on the bottom of the grave, and it breaks through into the light and the glory of heaven.

The ancients used to think that the straits entering the Red Sea were very dangerous places, and they supposed that every ship that went through those straits would be destroyed, and they were in the habit of putting on weeds of mourning for those who had gone on that voyage, as though they were actually dead. Do you know what they called those straits? They call them the "Gate of Tears." Oh, I stand to-day at the gate of tears through which many of your loved ones have gone, and I want to tell you that all are not shipwrecked that have gone through those straits into the great ocean stretching out beyond. The sound that comes from that other shore on still nights when we are wrapped in prayer makes me think that the departed are not dead. We are the dead—we who toil: we who weep: we who sin—we are the dead. How my heart aches for human sorrow! this sound of breaking hearts that I hear all about me! this last look of faces that will never brighten again! this last kiss of lips that never will speak again; this widowhood and orphanage! Oh, when will the day of sorrow be gone!

After the sharpest winter, the spring dismounts from the shoulder of a southern gale and puts its warm hand upon the earth, and in its palm there comes the grass, and there come the flowers, and God reads over the poetry of bird, and brook, and bloom, and pronounces it very good. What, my friends, if every winter had not its spring, and every night its day, and every gloom its glow, and every bitter now its sweet hereafter! If you have been on the sea, you know, as the ship passes in the night, there is a phosphorescent track left behind it; and as the waters roll up, they toss with unimaginable splendor. Well, across this great ocean of human trouble Jesus walks. Oh, that in the phosphorescent track of his feet we might all follow and be illumined!

There was a gentleman in the rail-car who saw in that same car three passengers of very different circumstances. The first was a maniac. He was carefully guarded by his attendants; his mind, like a ship dismasted, was beating against a dark, desolate coast, from which no help could come. The train stopped, and the man was taken out into the asylum, to waste away, perhaps, through years of gloom. The second passenger was a culprit. The outraged law had seized on him. As the cars jolted, the chains rattled. On his face were crime, depravity, and despair. The train halted, and he was taken out to the penitentiary, to which he had been condemned. There was the third passenger, under far different circumstances. She was a bride. Every hour was gay as a marriage-bell. Life glittered and beckoned. Her companion was taking her to his father's house. The train halted. The old man was there to welcome her to her new home, and his white locks snowed down upon her as he sealed his word with a father's kiss. Quickly we fly toward eternity. We will soon be there. Some leave this life condemned culprits. They refused a pardon, they carry their chains. Oh, may it be with us, that, leaving this fleeting life for the next, we may find our Father ready to greet us to our new home with him forever. That will be a marriage banquet! Father's welcome! Father's bosom! Father's kiss! Heaven! Heaven!

THE GOSPEL IN NEW MEXICO.

A LADY writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Albuquerque, N. M., as follows: "As my husband is writing to you I take the chance to tell a little of what I have learned about the needs of the Mexican and Indian portion of the population of New Mexico. They outnumber the English or American portion, and the latter are thus, as far as voting power is concerned, at the mercy of the others. Some of the native population have had no chance to get any education, or not enough to do any good; and so are the tools of such as choose to use them to help serve their own purposes.

"As far as I know through the teachers I have talked with about the Mexican and Indian schools, and the people patronizing them, there is a general willingness, even anxiety, to learn so as to be able to think, and act for themselves in all matters. The schools are the medium through which religious truth can be presented to the young; and be rendered attractive to them, if they see it exemplified in the lives of the teachers. One department of government school work is carried on in a large building on a lot adjoining ours. A school was taught some years in the next house north of us, but it is closed now.

"Some of the mission schools have been closed for want of money. There are some towns where no mission school has been started. One of these is an important place not far south of here. How can money be expended more wisely by a Christian, or any one, than in opening and sustaining these schools. The organized Societies are doing all they can with the means at their command, and would gladly use more in this work if it was given to them."

ANCIENT MAUSOLEUM AND TEMPLE IN AN EASTERN GARDEN.

A DOG'S REVENGE.

A CORRESPONDENT of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writing from the Valley of Virginia, says: "In the spring of 1876, I was riding with my father through a lonely wood which extended almost the entire distance along a road between his farm and a large flouring mill he owned, some two miles distant. This road we traveled almost daily, and old Jim, my father's favorite dog, was always with us. On one occasion, we met an old colored man, who had with him his dog, a much larger animal than my father's. When the dogs met they began to fight furiously, and old Jim was ignominiously beaten and compelled to remain at home for at least a month. When recovered, he took the road again, but whenever we met the old negro and his dog, Jim would hide in the wood until they passed. One day we came upon about twenty men at work on the road. Among the number was the old black man referred to, but his dog had been left at home. Old Jim cunningly found this out, and deliberately walking in among the crowd of men singled out the old black man and attacked him viciously. But for the timely aid of the workmen, who clubbed Jim off with their shovels, the colored man would have been torn to pieces. Nothing could have been more evident to us from the dog's manner than that as he could not whip the big dog, he would take revenge upon his master. . . . . .

So it is with revengeful human nature. Men often bring trouble upon innocent persons when trying to wrong others. We have no right to make use of revenge in any way, for "Vengeance is mine," saith the Lord, "and I will repay." —J. E. LONG, Elkton, Va.

A SURGEON'S REPROOF.

MR. MEIKLE, a gentleman of eminent piety, was a surgeon at Carnwath. He was once called to attend a gentleman who had been stung in the face by a wasp or bee, and found him very impatient, and swearing on account of his pain, in great wrath. "Oh, doctor," said he, "I am in great torment; can you any way help?" "Do not fear," replied Mr. M., "all will be over in a little while." Still, however, the gentleman continued to swear, and at length the surgeon determined to reprove him. "I see nothing the matter," said he, "only the sting might have been in a better place." "Where might it have been?" asked the sufferer. "Why, on the tip of your tongue."

How a Sceptic was Won.

ON one of the days of November, several years ago, a veteran lay missionary, a plain man, rose in the Fulton Street prayer-meeting, in New York City, to state his experience in testing the promises of God. Said he: "I was visiting in the neighborhood of my early home for a few days. Finding myself at leisure in the early morning, I said to myself: 'Now you are not going to hunt nor fish to-day, you might as well go to work just as if you were at home.' I thought I would not pick out an easy job, but would take up the hardest one on my mind, and that was to go and see a gentleman of very high standing and ability, a lawyer, whom I had never faithfully urged to repentance. I felt myself weak for such an interview, but I thought of the promise: 'Them that honor me I will honor.' And that promise I resolved to test.

"On inquiring for the gentleman at his office, I found he was not in. The gentleman who told me so, however, said he could attend to the business just as well. I told him I was afraid not. But he said he must insist upon it; that he was his partner, and wanted very much to do the business. I thought I would let him try. So I told him what I had called for, admitting that he was as much concerned in it as his partner, and hoping that he was as much concerned in it as his partner, and hoping that he still thought so himself. He answered promptly:

"I do. I have felt the deepest interest in the subject for more than a year—so much so that I have attended prayer-meetings and lingered about until everybody was gone, and the lights were out; but nobody ever said a word to me about religion. I have about concluded that there is nothing in it, or there is nobody that cares for me."

"At this moment a gay young fellow drove up to the door, and burst into the room. He wanted to know if the lawyer was ready for 'that ride.'

"'Not now,' said the lawyer. 'Sit down.' He sat down, and we went on talking. Pretty soon he edged his chair in between us. I laid my hand on his shoulder, and said to him: 'What I have been saying to this man is just as applicable to you as to him.'

"'Perhaps so,' said he. 'But I am a sceptic.'

"'A sceptic! How long have you been a sceptic?'

"'Oh! a number of years.'

"'Well, has it done you any good?'

"'I don't know that it has.'

"'Do you expect it will do you any good?'

"'Can't say I do.'

"'Well, then, if it has never done you any good, and is never going to do you any, you would not suffer much loss by giving it up, would you?'

"'No; but the difficulty is to get rid of it.'

"'Do you really want to get rid of it?'

"'Yes, I do.'

"'Let me test that.'

"I drew a total-abstinence pledge from my pocket, laid it before him and said:

"'Will you sign that?'

"He was all excitement from liquor at the time. He took up the paper and read it carethrough, and considered it well. Then he took the pen from the table and signed it. He was getting away from scepticism faster than I expected. He next took a card out of his pocket and copied the pledge on it, and returned it to his pocket.

"His friend looked on with perfect amazement, deeply affected, and signed the pledge also. It was a time for prayer. We went into an inner room, and turned the key. Before we came out, that young man had given his heart to God.

"As I bade him good-morning, he laid his hand on his heart, and said: 'I never felt so in all my life. I don't know why it is, or what it means.'

"'Why, how do you feel?'

"'Oh! strangely peaceful. I am perfectly happy.'

"Not long afterward I heard that this young man was studying for the Gospel ministry. He is now a settled and very useful pastor. As for the lawyer who attended my business: I afterward saw an account of a sermon just preached by this same partner, lawyer, and judge. I felt satisfied that he was attending to my business."

MESSIAH'S KINGDOM.

S. S. Lesson for June 18. Mal. 3:1-12 Golden Text, Mal. 3: 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

MESSIAH'S Kingdom! what is it? To the Jew it is the coming of the King to sit on "the throne of his father David," and to fulfil all the promises of temporal greatness and prosperity to his ancient people, the seed of Abraham. To the Jew, Messiah's kingdom is future. But there is, even now for the Christian, a kingdom of God which is within (Luke 17: 21), a kingdom where Christ is already King, in the hearts and lives of his own people. It is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." This kingdom cometh not "with outward show," it is a hidden kingdom, a kingdom of priests who are being educated to reign with Christ upon earth, in his future outward kingdom when he shall "rule over the house of Jacob forever." It is those who rule now with Christ that shall rule then, those who are now more than conquerors over life, death, angels, principalities, powers, things present, and things to come; who, by passing such standards in the school of Christ's overcomers, shall be fitted to reign with him in his coming kingdom. "To him that overcometh will I give to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

"Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me, and the Lord whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, and the messenger or angel of the covenant whom ye delight in saith the Lord of hosts." (R.V.) Who is the messenger, and what is the coming of the Lord here spoken of? is the question which will naturally occur to every one who is inquiring of the Lord. "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven." What day can this be but that time of tribulation spoken of in Dan. 12: 1. It is expressly stated in relation to this messenger, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." It was just this which was prophesied of John the Baptist of whom Jesus said: "If ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come;" and again: "I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." Matt. 17: 11-13. And yet the great and terrible day of the Lord has not yet burst, with all its unprecedented horrors, upon us!

God's Measure of Time.

There are few who understand the delay of the Lord! The apostle Peter understood it: "Beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise as some men count slackness, but is long suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance." "And account that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation." (II. Pet. 3: 8, 9, 15). His education of his own kingly ones, his Bride, who shall reign with him, is the object around which all things circle in his holy eyes. Time with him is measured by the progress made in this, the desire of his heart. God can wait a thousand, two thousand years, as he has already done in this "day of salvation," and then again, when for the elects' sake, he shall shorten the days of the time of trouble. (Matt. 24: 22), he can compress the work of a thousand years into one day.

But he will come, he is coming, and his coming shall be sudden, no time will be left for preparation when he comes. As the sudden flash of lightning, as a snare, as the breaking in of a thief at midnight, shall it be. He shall come to his temple. As the Babe; the Child under subjection, when he was in the midst of the doctors; as the Teacher, as the great Physician, he came to the earthly temple during the days of his flesh. But he is building now, with living stones, "a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices" (I. Pet. 2: 5); "a building fitly framed together. . . . a holy temple in the Lord. . . a habitation of God through the Spirit." Eph. 2: 20-22.) To this temple he will come, and with his chosen and prepared Bride, he will manifest himself. But the moment of his coming with her, having first taken her to be with him will be the searching moment for the lukewarm Church and for the world. While "the Spirit and the Bride say, Come," the trenchant question for those who are not looking for him must be, "But who may abide the day of his coming, and who shall Stand when He Appeareth?"

Those who "serve a living and a true God," and who "look for his Son from heaven," are not in darkness that that day should overtake them as a thief, because they are "all the children of light, and the children of the day," they "are not of night nor of darkness." They shall "stand when he appeareth." What is there in his coming which shall strike terror into those who are unprepared? "He is like a refiner's fire and like fullers' soap. And he shall sit as a Refiner and purifier of silver; and shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver (i. e. with fire), that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." Under God's fire, all will come to light, all will be discovered. No Ananias or Sapphira will escape his searching gaze or the burning heat of the fiery trial which must try them, and nothing which is not really divine, nothing which is of self or of the flesh will escape. But how about those who are overcomers, and who are ready for him, who are not ashamed before him at his coming? The Refiner's fire has been already upon them, they have understood and met him in his purposes of love and holiness, they have submitted to his "washing of water by the Word," they have purified themselves even as he is pure; they have watched and prayed always that they "might be accounted worthy to escape all those things (the time of trouble), which shall come to pass," and so they shall "stand before the Son of man;" "stand when he appeareth." Blessed are they who accept now day by day, and hour by hour, from the hand of God, the temptations, the annoyances, the humiliations, the crosses, which God permits to work together for the great end of conforming his own to the image of his Son, before the time comes when "the Son of man shall send forth his angels and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity;" that time when "many shall be purified and made white and tried" (Dan. 12: 10) in the midst of the awful calamities of the time of trouble.

In taking his seat upon the throne of David, the great King of the Jews will subject his kingdom to a purification which will give

No Quarter to Sin:

"I will come near to you in judgment, and I will be a swift Witness against the sorcerers (all spiritualism will be purged away), and against the adulterers." The present state of things, in which a woman is degraded for life by the sin of man against her, will be reversed under the holy reign of Jesus, it is the adulterers, not the poor fallen women, upon whom his cleansing scourge shall come. And then the well-known sins of unscrupulous men in commercial transactions shall be judged and brought to light. "He will witness against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts." The commercial world shall no longer consist chiefly of a multitude of business men whose great aim is to take all the advantage they can one of the other, at any cost to truth, to the claims of the laborer, the widow, the orphan, and the stranger. The Lord himself will take the weak ones under his personal protection, and injustice shall cease out of the earth.

What then is our part meanwhile? Surely to recognize now, and yield now, to him who is preparing his people for his reign. In the midst of a generation of general declension from real dealing with God; in the midst of those who go "away form his ordinances," who "rob God," whose "words are stout against him," who say "It is vain to serve God," who "call the proud happy—it is our privilege to bring all the tithes into the storehouse," to recognize God's claims and his right in us above all others,—then when his kingdom comes, when his overcomers shall reign with him, it shall be fulfilled; and all nations shall call you beloved, for ye shall be a delightsome land saith the Lord of hosts."

"The time is short," the kingdoms of this world are tottering to their fall, rumors of wars, preparations for war are abroad, the strain among all classes is becoming more and more intense and impossible things cannot long go on as they are going. The present peace of Europe is such that politicians speak of it as liable, at almost a moment's notice, to be changed into a strife of nations such as has been unprecedented in history, because of the size and strength of European armies, and the general distrust and suspicion which is abroad. What then? Does it not behoove those who are watching for the coming King to be "looking for, and hasting the great day of God" "in all holy conversation and godliness?" (II. Pet. 3: 11, 12.)

AN ORIENTAL REFINER.

A BOOK of expostulation, reproach and warning is this last book of the Old Testament. The writer vails his personality under the name of Malachi, which means "my messenger." That may have been his name but was probably assumed to impress the people with the idea that the book was a message from God, and that no importance attached to the identity of the messenger. It is believed that the book was written near the end of the life of Nehemiah, when the Temple had been rebuilt and a reaction had set in from the high and devout spirit which had characterized the first years after the return from exile. The prophet wrote under deep concern. He saw a growing laxity of faith and conduct in the people and, which was more ominous, he saw it in the priests. It appeared to him that there was a general forgetfulness of the causes of their long exile. They were getting to be no better than their fathers, who for their sins had been driven out of their land. Let them beware, he said in effect, or a worse evil would befall them. He deals with the priests first, after the brief introduction, occupying five verses of the first chapter. He reproaches them for their mercenary motives. They care, he says, so little about God and his house that they would not so much as close the doors, if they were not paid to do it. Then he deals with the people, who, it would appear, are again marrying heathen wives and doing all kinds of wickedness. Then he proceeds to speak of the Messiah whom they are expecting. He will come, he says, and come suddenly, but they have more reason to dread his coming than to hope for it. It will be a time of reproof, of discipline, and of testing. Like fire it will burn as well as enlighten. The Lord has his jewels among men. Not all are bad. When he comes he will find out who are genuine. The test will be one of fire. The good need not be afraid of it, for it will only refine and purify them; but the false it will utterly consume. The hearts and lives of men must be changed, or God would smite the earth with a curse, and with that ominous word, the light of prophecy, which had burned for about four hundred years, dies out.

I will send my messenger. Those who do work for God should remember this view of the function. It is God's work and he can and will do it; his messenger's duty is simply to prepare the way. The most successful preachers are those who keep themselves out of sight and give Christ prominence. It is narrated of the great sculptor Michael Angelo, that when at work he wore over his forehead, fastened on his artist's cap, a lighted candle, in order that no shadow of himself might fall upon his work! A Spanish artist was employed to paint a representation of "The Last Supper." It was his ambition to throw all the sublimity of his art into the figure and countenance of the Master; but he put on the table in the foreground some chased cups, the workmanship of which was exceedingly beautiful, and when his friends came to see the picture on the easel every one was constrained to exclaim, "What lovely cups!" "Ah!" said he, "I have made a mistake; these cups divert the eyes of the spectator from the Master, to whom I wished to direct the attention of the observer." He then took his brush and deliberately painted them off the canvas, for he was determined that "Jesus only" should be the centre of attraction and admiration.

The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come. We know now as a fact that although the Jews continued anxiously looking for the Messiah they did not recognize him when he came. They were looking for a king, and because Jesus came in humble station they rejected his claims. One of the chaplains of the Queen of England relates that in former years her majesty during her residence, at Osborne, frequently went about among the cottagers without disclosing her identity. In the early years of her widowhood she spent a great deal of her time in that way. She took a great interest in any woman newly widowed like herself, and seemed to derive comfort herself in trying to comfort them. On one occasion she visited an aged widow who was bed-ridden. The old lady did not know her visitor, but was evidently cheered. As she was alone the queen stayed and read the Bible to her. During the reading two eager girls pushed rudely by the visitor, abruptly asked the old lady if she needed anything and hurried away. The invalid apologized for their manner by saying they were very busy getting ready to attend the morrow's fete in honor of the queen, whom they were anxious to see. The visitor stayed sometime, and on leaving placed a sovereign ($5) in the widow's hand, which she received with tearful joy. She asked the lady for her name. With a pleasant smile, the lady answered, "I am the Queen!" The invalid listened in amazement. "Dear, dear!" she said, her thoughts reverting to the two girls, "how sorry they will be! They have thought so much of seeing you to-morrow."

He shall sit as a refiner. In silver, says Dr. Deems, there are two kinds of dross, that which is mingled with it as quartz or rock and that which pervades its entire substance as chlorine or sulphur. It is necessary to eliminate both before the silver can be called pure. In human nature there are the same two kinds of dross. It is not sufficient to give up evil habits and evil associations; the work is not done until the pervading evil in the nature and the heart is purged. The refiner sitting before his crucible is a significant illustration. A silver refiner was asked, "Why do you sit while you are refining?" He replied, "It is necessary, so that I can fix my eyes steadily on the metal. If it remained too long exposed to the heat it would be injured." "How do you know," was the next question, "when it is sufficiently refined?" The answer was suggestive: "When I can see my face in it, like in a mirror I know the process is completed." When heavy and long-continued troubles fall upon men, we must not infer that they have been wicked and are being punished. It may be that they are precious in God's sight and that he is refining them with care and they will be taken out of the fierce heat when he sees himself perfectly reflected in their lives. He will not keep them in so long as to be spoiled.

Bring ye all the tithes. The prophet puts his appeal on the lowest motive, that he might reach even those who could not be stirred by higher motives. You will prosper, he tells them, more by bringing in to God's house the proportion of your income which is due to him than if you kept it yourselves. Bring in the offering and God will bless you beyond your capacity to contain it. Thomas Fuller illustrates the idea by the story of Alexander the Great. When a child he made an offer of frankincense to the gods. He took a double handful and cast it into the sacred fire. For this he was reproached by his governor, who told him that one handful would have been sufficient. Alexander, however, believed that the gods appreciated liberality and would liberally reward the liberal giver. Afterwards when he had conquered India and all the known world, he reminded his Governor of the incident by sending to him five hundred talents' weight of frankincense. He left the governor to infer from the gift how liberally the gods had rewarded him for his childhood's offering.

PRESBYTERIANS IN COUNCIL.

The Decisive Vote Taken in the General Assembly on the Momentous Briggs Case—The Meeting-place and the Assembly Leaders—A Solemn Declaration by Prof Briggs.

A BRIEF outline of the circumstances which aroused unusual interest in the proceedings of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church appeared in these columns last week; we now give a picture of the New York Avenue Church, in Washington, in which the Assembly meets, and portraits of Dr. William A. Bartlett, the pastor of the church; of Dr. Willis G. Craig, the Moderator of the Assembly, and of the two men whose position in the great case submitted to the Assembly for judicial action answers to those of plaintiff and defendant in civil cases—Dr. G. W. F. Birch and Prof. Charles A. Briggs. That case, as was foreseen before the Assembly met, dwarfed into insignificance all other subjects with which the Commissioners were to deal. It influenced the choice of a Moderator, the composition of the Committees and the arrangement of all matters of business. From the outset of the proceedings it was the most prominent subject in the mind of every Commissioner and his attitude on this case was the main factor in determining his classification.

THE NEW YORK AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, WASHINGTON, D. C.

REV. G. W. F. BIRCH, D.D.

It reached its first stage on the way to a final decision in a vote taken on May 26. Prof. Briggs and his friends had contended that the case could not come regularly before the Assembly; but after a long argument the Assembly decided that the trial was in order and should take place. The vote stood 410 to 145 and was regarded as a test vote. The arguments used against the trial were two. First, that there was no justification for an appeal against an acquittal. If a man is charged with a crime and is tried in a court of law and convicted, he has the right to appeal, but if he is acquitted he cannot again be tried for the same offence. As Prof. Briggs was acquitted on his trial before the New York Presbytery he claimed that further proceedings were barred. A second ground for protest was that if an appeal from the decision of the Presbytery could be taken it should be made to the next higher court, which is the Synod of New York, and not until it had been heard there, could it properly come before the General Assembly as the court of final resort. In reply, the prosecution urged that this differed from criminal trials and resembled an action for breach of contract, inasmuch as there was an agreement entitling the Professor to valuable consideration in return for certain services. The action was therefore based on the charge that he had, in teaching the doctrines specified, failed to fulfil his part of the contract and in all such actions either side has the right of appeal if it loses in the first trial. Also that the appeal might be carried at once to the General Assembly, passing over the Synod if, as in this case, questions affecting the whole church were involved and general injury would result from delay. Four days were chiefly occupied in debating and deciding these points and, as above stated, the decision was against Dr. Briggs and his friends.

One of the most impressive scenes of the debate occurred at the close of Prof. Briggs' argument. He had dealt with the technical aspect of the question and paused for a moment. Then with great solemnity of manner he said, "I am charged with teaching doctrines which are fundamental errors. I deny that I have ever taught any doctrines that are fundamental errors, and my Presbytery has acquitted me of teaching any fundamental errors. I affirm before this body that I believe the Holy Scriptures to be the Word of God, the infallible rule of faith and practice, according to the vow that I assumed at my ordination, and which I have assumed every three years, according to the rule of the Union Theological Seminary. I affirm that I hold to the whole doctrine taught in the first chapter of the Westminster Confession relating to Holy Scripture, without any qualification or reservation whatever. I beg leave to affirm that I hold to the entire system of doctrine set forth in the Westminster Confession, and anything that I may have said that at all conflicts with this statement is due to the misinterpretations which have been put upon the language which I have uttered.

"That is all I have to say. If I have said anything that at all injures the feelings of any member of this court, I very much regret it. If I have said anything in my inaugural that has disturbed the peace of the Church or caused any doubt or uncertainty or affliction to even the feeblest of God's children, I regret it more than any one else can do. I have now been a teacher of the Bible in the Union Theological Seminary for twenty years. There are only four members now teaching in your theological seminaries that have been in service longer than I have. There are only two of them that have taught more ministers now in the service than I have. I challenge the production of a single one of these ministers that have been under my instruction during the last twenty years who can say that anything I have taught him has undermined or diminished his faith in the Divine authority of Holy Scripture, or his love for the Word of God."

The applause which followed this eloquent utterance indicated that many of those who heard it were deeply moved. Its evident sincerity, caused many to ask themselves how it could be possible that such a man could be on trial, as he phrased it, "for his ecclesiastical life." The advocates of the prosecution, however, by recalling to the attention of the Assembly certain passages from Prof. Briggs' writings, removed the favorable impression which had been made, and when the Commissioners debated the question afterwards, before proceeding to a vote it became evident that the hostility to the Professor had not been materially diminished. This fact was clearly established by the decisive character of the vote, when it was taken.

REV. WILLIS G. CRAIG, D.D.

It was significant that several of the speakers, while stating their intention to vote for the trial, deplored the necessity of doing so or expressed their personal respect for the accused. One of them plainly declared that no prosecution would have been undertaken if it had not been instigated "by the so-called religious press of the Presbyterian Church." The same opinion was expressed in private by several Commissioners, who regretted that the issue had been forced on the Church. Many who do not agree with Prof. Briggs hoped the Assembly would refrain from branding him as a heretic, lest the impression should be made that freedom of thought was not allowed in the Presbyterian Church.

That hope, however, was doomed to disappointment. The Assembly on May 31, decided by a vote of 383 to 116 to sustain the charges against Prof. Briggs. The decision was not reached without vigorous protest and earnest appeals from a large number of eminent ministers and laymen. Among these was Dr. George Alexander, one of the ablest, most evangelical and most useful Presbyterian ministers in New York. He defined the attitude of the New York Presbytery on the case and explained how many ministers who did not agree with Prof. Briggs voted for his acquittal. He believed that Presbyterianism did not mean entire uniformity of thought and that a man might be a firm Presbyterian while holding the views the Professor had enunciated. Another appeal came from Rev. Geo. L. Spining, who pleaded for peace and quiet, and a generous treatment of Dr. Briggs, whom he eulogized as one of the foremost scholars in the world. There was no one in that building, he said, who would sooner or more gladly lay down his life rather than surrender his conviction that the Bible was the infallible Word of God. Elder Charles F. Griffin of Indianapolis also urged acquittal. He was satisfied with the solemn asseverations Dr. Briggs had made in the hearing of all present of his belief in the Bible. He did not think Dr. Briggs was lying when he made them. But even on the lower ground of policy, he believed a conviction would be a blunder. You cannot, he said, stamp out an honest conviction; you may make Dr. Briggs a martyr, but you cannot compel conviction.

Rev. Henry M. Storrs said: "After a ministry of between forty and fifty years, I should be false to my personal history if I did not hold dear above all else the Bible. But I say to all these scholars: 'Go where you will, learn all you can of the origin and history of all its books, and bring it to me, for it will throw additional light to what I hold to be the perfect Word of God." Frank G. Ellet of Flint, Mich., said: "I believe that fifty years from now, we will see that Dr. Briggs was sent from God to make the Church evangelical. The reformers in all ages have antagonized the Church. I believe he is opening a door out of which may come a broad evangelical Presbyterian Church, which we have not now."

PROF. CHARLES A. BRIGGS.

But these appeals and warnings had no effect on the Assembly. When the final vote was taken, the numbers voting against the Professor were to those votiag for him in the proportion of three to one. So far, therefore, as majorities can decide a question of this kind, this is decided for the Presbyterian Church. Henceforth every man holding such views as those taught by the Professor, whether he be a minister or a layman must understand that he is condemned as a heretic by the governing body of his church. What the effect of the decision will be, it is difficult to foresee. That Prof. Briggs and those who sympathize with him will be silenced is not likely. They may form a new church or join some other denomination such as the Congregational, which would gladly welcome them. Some may prefer to remain in the Presbyterian Church keeping their views in the background, in the hope that the new methods of study which have led them to their present conclusions may become general and that gradually their brethren may be brought into agreement with them. Whatever their course may be, we may confidently leave the issue in God's hands. Both parties in the church have besought his guidance and he will lead them into all truth.

A TIMELY PARABLE.

I have always noticed that just in proportion as a man cannot get along himself he is fearful of some one else making an excitement. Last week a mud-turtle down by the brook opened its shell and discoursed to a horse that was coming down to drink. The mud-turtle said to the horse: "Just as I get sound asleep you are sure to come past and wake me up. We always used to have a good quiet time down here in the swamp till you got in the habit of thumping along this way. I am conservative and like to keep in my shell. I have been pastor of thirteen other mud-turtles, and we always had peace till you came, and next week at our semi-annual meeting of mud-turtles we shall either have you voted a nuisance or will talk it over in private, eight or ten of us, which will probably be the more prudent way."

Then the mud-turtle's shell went shut with a snap, at which the horse kicked up his heels as he turned to go up to the barn to be harnessed to a load of corn that was ready for the market.

Let us all wake up and go to work. There are in the private membership of our churches and in the ministry a great many men who are dead, but never had the common decency to get buried. With the harvest white and "lodging" for the lack of a sickle, instead of lying under the trees criticising the sweating reapers who are at work, let us throw off our own coat and go out to see how good a swathe we can cut.

"SLOW UP!"

SOME of the worst-tempered people of the day are religious people, from the fact that they have no rest. Added to the necessary work of the world, they superintend two Sunday-schools, listen to two sermons, and every night have meetings of charitable and Christian institutions. They look after the beggars, hold conventions, speak at meetings, wait on ministers, serve as committee-men, take all the hypercriticisms that inevitably come to earnest workers, rush up and down the world and develop their hearts at the expense of all the other functions. They are the best men on earth, and Satan knows it and is trying to kill them as fast as possible. They know not that it is as much a duty to take care of their health as to go to the sacrament. It is as much a sin to commit suicide with the sword of truth as with a pistol.

Our earthly life is a treasure to be guarded. It is an outrageous thing to die when we ought to live. There is no use in firing up a steamer to such a speed that the boiler bursts mid-Atlantic, when at a more moderate rate it might have reached the docks at Liverpool. It is a sin to try to do the work of thirty years in five years.

A Rocky Mountain locomotive engineer once told us that at certain places they changed locomotives and let the machine rest, as a locomotive always kept in full heat soon got out of order. Our advice to all overworked good people is, "Slow up!" Slacken your speed as you come to the crossings. All your faculties for work at this rate will be consumed. You are on fire now—see the premonitory smoke. A hot axle!

BALKY PEOPLE.

PASSING along a country road quite recently, we found a man, a horse and wagon in trouble. The vehicle was slight and the road was good, but the horse refused to draw, and his driver was in a bad predicament. He had already destroyed his whip in applying inducements to progress in travel. He had pulled the horse's ears with a sharp string. He had backed him into the ditch. He had built a fire of straw underneath him, the only result a smashed dash-board. The chief effect of the violences and cruelties applied was to increase the divergency of feeling between the brute and his master. We said to the besweated and outraged actor in the scene that the best thing for him to do was to let his horse stand for a while unwhipped and uncoaxed, setting some one to watch him while he, the driver, went away to cool off. We learned that the plan worked admirably; that the cold air, and the appetite for oats, and the solitude of the road, favorable for contemplation, had made the horse move for adjournment to some other place and time; and when the driver came up, he had but to take up the reins and the beast, erst so obstinate, dashed down the road at a perilous speed.

There is not as much difference between horses and men as you might suppose. The road between mind and equine instinct is short and soon traveled. The horse is sometimes superior to his rider. If anything is good and admirable in proportion as it answers the end of its being, then the horse that bends into its traces before a Fourth avenue car is better than its blaspheming driver. He who cannot manage a horse cannot manage a man.

We know of pastors who have balky parishioners. When any important move is to take place, and all the other horses of the team are willing to draw, they lay themselves back in the harness.

First the pastor pats the obstreperous elder or deacon on the neck and tells him how much he thinks of him. This only makes him shake his mane and grind his bit. He will die first before he consents to such a movement. Next, he is pulled by the ear, with a good many sharp insinuations as to his motives for holding back. Fires of indignation are built under him for the purpose of consuming his balkiness. He is whipped with the scourge of public opinion, but this only makes him kick fiercely and lay harder in the breeching-straps. He is backed down into the ditch of scorn and contempt, but still is not willing to draw an ounce. Oh foolish minister, trying in that way to manage a balky parishioner! Let him alone. Go on and leave him there. Pay less attention to the horse that balks, and give more oats to those that pull. Leave him out in the cold. Some day you will come back and find him glad to start. At your first advance he will arch his neck, paw his hoof, bend into the bit, stiffen the traces and dash on. We have the same prescription for balky horses and men: for a little while let them alone.

Two or three years ago, we were the guests on an English manor. The statuary, the ferneries, the botanical and horicultural genius of the place had done all they could do to make the place attractive. For generations there had been an amassing of plate and costly surroundings. At half past nine o'clock in the morning, the proprietor of the estate had the bell rung, and some twenty or thirty men servants and maid servants came in prayers. The proprietor of the estate read the Scriptures, gave out the hymn, started the music, his daughter at the organ, and then, the music over, the proprietor of the estate kneeled down and commended all his guests, all his family, all his employees to the Lord Almighty. God can trust such a man as that with a large estate. He knows how to abound. He trusted God and God trusted him. And I could call off the roll of fifty merchant princes as mighty for God as they are mighty in worldly successes.

E. M., Schuyler, Neb. If a man has led a Christian life and has done all he could for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, will he have a higher place in heaven than he who lived a wicked life and was converted at the eleventh hour?

Very little has been revealed to us about the conditions of life in heaven. It is therefore difficult to conceive of them. It is however reasonable to suppose that the Christian who has served his Lord for many years on earth would be better fitted to appreciate and enjoy the bliss of heaven than he who has lived in sin almost to the last. Christ's parable of the talents (Matt. 25: 14-23), and Paul's remark that "one star differeth from another star in glory" (I. Cor. 15: 41) imply that there will be differences. But as to places and dignities there, we know nothing.

Mrs. G. W. Mashin, Albia, Ia. Please allow me also to reply to Mr. Bradford Williams' questions, in regard to Job. I cannot suffer that good man to be located in Esau's family, when God's Word plainly tells us that his Father was Jacob's fifth son and his mother (Leah) called his name Issachar, and his (Issachar's) son's names were Tola, Phuvah, Job, and Shimrod. Job's three (pretended) friends were of Esau's tribe, Eliphaz being Esau's oldest son.

H. J. Van Alstine, Galena, S. Dak. In giving out hymns, what is meant by common, long, and short metre, &c.?

To this Mr. Hubert P. Main (the well-known composer and musical authority), replies:

Common Metre is generally given to designate a 4-line hymn when the syllables are 1 line of 8 syllables, 1 line of 6 syllables, 1 line of 8 syllables, and 1 line of 6 (or 8 and 6) syllables. Short Metre is: 1 line of 6 syllables, 1 line of 6 syllables, 1 line of 8 syllables, 1 line of 6 syllables or 6 and 8 syllables. Long Metre: 4 lines of 8 syllables each.

Some books print 8, 6, 8, 6, instead of C.M. 6, 8, 8, 6, instead of S. M., and 8, 8, 8, 8, instead of L. M.

J. H. Freeman, Bat Cave, N. C. Is it consistent with good Christian deportment and church discipline for a church member to hold revenue offices, such as Deputy Collector, Whiskey Gauger, store keeper, etc., for Government Distillers?

While there may be no absolute sin in the mere fact of holding such offices, the association is one that a real Christian would earnestly strive to avoid. The very fact of being connected with anything that might be a means of sin, degradation and stumbling to others, should make us specially careful to avoid such contact ourselves.

Isaac W. Ogle, Ocala, Fla. Is it true that after a man is converted he has to labor and lose his sins pardoned the second time, and like Esau which he must seek after, and that unless and until he attains it he is lifeless and of little use in the church?

You are doubtless aware that there is a difference between justification and sanctification. The former is an act complete and perfect in itself as when a man who is under sentence for crime is pardoned and restored to his rights of citizenship. Sanctification, on the other hand, is a process, as when the same man is being taught how to live a good life. It is an education, a discipline, a continuous development. The Holy Spirit, imparted to him when he is justified, works all this in him. His rate of progress is determined by the degree to which he yields to the Holy Spirit's influence and power. The goal before him is to become like Christ. His growth may be uniform, or there may be occasions when under preaching, or in prayer, he may be conscious of making a greater advance in an hour than he may have made at any time before. The idea of this sanctification being completed in a moment, as people who talk of "the second blessing" generally believe, is misleading. Experience has proved that men whose growth in the divine life is steady, so far from being lifeless and useless, are more reliable and practically useful than the people whose progress is spasmodic.

Mrs. John Maxey, Forest City, Pa. What is George Muller's address?

Ashley Down, Bristol, England.

A. C. Holzwarth, Newark, N. J. Which is the longest book in the New Testament, the shortest book, and the shortest verse?

Luke is the longest, although he has fewer chapters than Matthew or Acts. The second Epistle of John is the shortest. The shortest verse is John 11: 35.

B. Bradley, Hillstown, Conn., in forwarding his contribution to the Tabernacle Emergency Fund, sends this poetic tribute:

Bill's a very poor poet, and very poor scholar,
But, thank God, not so poor that he can't spare a dollar,
And as everything helps, be it ever so wee,
This bard in the shanty beneath the big tree,
Though he earns his wee penny by very hard work,
Sends something to help you to save the big kirk:
For he, Bill, doesn't want Boanerges to flit—
He means that son of thunder, called Dr. DeWitt.
Shall the big kirk in Brooklyn, like Kirk-Alloway,
A playhouse become, in which "auld Nick" may play?
Shall a house built for God by players be bought
And to Satan be deeded? Away with the thought!
God forbid Christ's disciples should let it be so!
May all HERALD readers vociferate No!
Let all give a hand at the rescuing work,
And thwart the old devil by saving the kirk.
Let those who have much, if the Lord they will trust,
As Jonathan said, hurry "down with the dust;"
And let those that have little—like this man of rhymes
If they haven't got dollars, come down with their dimes.
If they can't do big things, let every poor man,
And every poor woman, just do what they can!

R. J. S., Arkansas City, Kans. What will be the work of Christ and his resurrected saints during the millennium?

There is no detailed statement of the specific work; but it is evident that in governing the whole world and bringing it into the physical, social and spiritual conditions in which God would have it, there will be no lack of occupation. Even Christian people do not always lead consistent lives and they will need to be taught and disciplined, or the world would have no millennium such as we understand that condition to be.

A. J. Bryant, Newellton, La. 1. Will this earth abide forever? 2. Does the Bible allow persons to marry again who did not separate for fornication? 3. Is foot-washing binding on Christians now? 4. Will Dr. Talmage preach on subjects suggested to him?

1. You will find an explicit statement on the subject in II. Peter 3: 10-13. 2. The Apostle Paul (I. Cor. 7: 12-16), referring to matrimonial difficulties, made remarks which have been considered by eminent theologians as sanctioning divorce for desertion. They appear to others, however, to sanction separation rather than divorce. With this exception, which is a doubtful one, there is no other cause recognized by the New Testament as justifying divorce. Consequently, persons who have separated for any other cause, cannot have the sanction of the Bible in marrying again, while the persons from whom they have been divorced are living. 3. Yes; the laws of health and decency require people to wash their feet at proper times. But there is no religious reason for one person washing the feet of another, if that other is able to do the duty for himself. If he is willing to do his brother service even a menial service, in a time of need, he fulfils the injunction (John 13: 14) on which some people base the opinion that it is a pious duty to twash the feet of others. 4. We believe that Dr. Talmage is always willing to receive suggestions of subjects, but neither he nor any other minister would pledge himself in advance to accept them.

The distance traveled by the Israelites in the Wilderness is computed from the point of their deliverance on the further shore of the Red Sea to the point where they forded the Jordan. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CENTRAL AMERICAN TROUBLES.

THE Central American Republic of Nicaragua, which has acquired a closer interest for us as the scene of the attempt to pierce the Isthmus, has been for several weeks past in the throes of revolution. President Sacaza, whose portrait is here given, appears to have caused the outbreak by dictatorial and unconstitutional acts. He was chosen in 1889, to finish out the four-years-term of President Carazo, who died while in office. Sacaza was anxious to be re-elected for a full term, but doubted whether he could gain his ends by constitutional means. He therefore banished his most powerful rivals, including ex-President Zavala, and, shortly before the day of election, he drafted into military service large numbers of men from the districts opposed to him, thus depriving them of the power of voting. At the same time he liberated a corresponding number of soldiers who were pledged to his support. By these means, and others of a similarly unfair character, he succeeded in getting himself elected. No organized opposition was made; but since his election the popular discontent has increased and culminated. It is charged that he gave out contracts to members af his family, which enabled them to enrich themselves with public money, and when the treasury was emptied, the same persons were authorized to raise loans, a large part of which they pocketed, and which Sacaza pledged the national credit to repay. His enemies succeeded recently in organizing a plot for the overthrow of his government and won over a large part of the army, into which, as before stated, Sacaza had drafted many of his opponents. It was found that only four of the twelve departments of the Republic were faithful to him. At a preconcerted signal a general rising took place, and, on May 20, a battle was fought near Masaya, which lasted twelve hours, and resulted in the defeat of Sacaza's troops. He lost one-half of his army in killed, prisoners and deserters. The insurgents also suffered severely, and being deficient in arms and money, were unable to pursue their advantage. Sacaza at latest reports had recognized the hopelessness of further fighting and was endeavoring to make terms with the insurgents. Preceding and during the decisive battle, Sacaza made havoc in the capital. Most of his enemies took refuge in the foreign consulates, but all whom he could find were treated in summary fashion and many innocent persons suffered at the hands of the soldiery. Sacaza will certainly be deposed and stripped of his wealth even if his life is spared. He must now be in a condition to appreciate the truth of the prophet's warning to all who acquire riches and power unrighteously. (Jer. 17: 11.)

The Ship Saved by a Wave.

A TERRIBLE disaster at sea was averted in an extraordinary manner a few days ago. The captain of the steamship Wivenhoe which arrived at Baltimore, Md., on May 25 reported an experience which he says he shall never forget. Just before leaving Cardiff he was asked to take on board ten cases of chemicals which were consigned by a Hamburg firm to a wholesale chemist in Philadelphia. He was unable to accommodate them in the hold with the other merchandise, but offered to take them on the deck and his offer was accepted. On the fourth day of the voyage a gale sprang up with high seas. As the captain was going aft about daybreak he was astounded to see the whole afterpart of his ship a solid mass of fire. Flames leaped from the decks and rose higher than the masts. Both sea and storm at the time were violent. The captain felt that his craft was doomed. Just then a tremendous wave struck the Wivenhoe, throwing her on her beam ends. Darkness also took possession of the deck—the leaping flames had disappeared. A hasty examination was made to see if the hold was on fire, but it was not, nor was there a sign of the ten iron-bound cases. The bills of lading were brought out to see what they contained, and to the skipper's astonishment he learned that he had been carrying natrium metallic, a chemical used by photographers which burns when exposed to air or water. The cases had been carried overboard into the boiling sea. If they had been swept away and lost before the flames burst from them, the captain would doubtless have deplored the loss; but after he had seen the flames, he was glad that the cases were gone, as they might have otherwise involved the loss of the whole ship. Sometimes God's providences are to be explained in the same way. A man may grieve when he suffers the loss of property, or office, but he might not do so if he knew what the retention of them might have cost. (Matt. 5: 29.)

A Dog's Achievement.

A VISITOR to the World's Fair, who is the engineer of an electric company in France, gives a report of a strange solution of a difficult problem. His company undertook to make and lay the underground wires which were to connect two cities. They were to be laid in a wide culvert, which had an opening at every interval of a hundred yards. When the firm undertook the work, replacing another firm which had failed to perform it, the culvert was already laid but no arrangement had been made for carrying the cable through it. The difficulty was embarrassing, and no way of overcoming it could be devised for some time. One morning, however, the foreman appeared, accompanied by a small white terrier dog. He announced that his dog could do the work required. He was laughed at, but he insisted that the dog was very intelligent and that he had given it some training. Eventually a trial was made. The end of a light rope was thrown down and the dog at once seized it. He was put in one of the openings of the culvert and, at a word from its master, speedily disappeared. The man hurried off to the next opening and called his dog. In a few minutes the terrier was seen with the end of the rope still in his mouth, having carried it safely through one section of the culvert. The electric cable was drawn through with the rope and in that way the whole cable was laid. The dog is now permanently attached to the company and has since laid many miles of cable. It is a suggestive thought that although the dog can know nothing of telegraphy the fact of his being able to go where men cannot, renders telegraphic communication possible in that district. It is so in spiritual matters; even a child, or a man who cannot preach or teach may do valuable service. There may be persons whom only he can reach and it is his duty and privilege to bring them into communication with God. (Isa. 11: 6.)

THE GOVERNMENT TROOPS SHOOTING DOWN REVOLUTIONISTS.

To Illuminate the Body.

A REMARKABLE exhibition was made before the New York Academy of Medicine on May 24. An eminent physician read a paper on the aid of the electric light in the diagnosis of disease. He exhibited a minute incandescent lamp which had been constructed specially for medical use and which he called a transluminator. It is scarcely larger than a pea and is attached to a rubber handle and connected to an electric battery by wires. A second glass globe surrounds the lamp, the space between the two globes being filled with water to absorb the heat of the carbon filament. The lamp gives a light equal to four-candle power. The lecturer said: "The value of the lamp, lies in the fact that it can be used to examine any portion of the body that is accessible, such as the mouth and throat. By attaching the lamp to a small rubber tube it can be lowered into the stomach, the current turned on and the examination made from the exterior. Of course you could not see every part of the stomach, but if there were a tumor on one side you could locate it on account of the shadows thrown. There were several sizes of the lamps, the smallest being for use in examining the interior of the ear. These lamps will doubtless be of great value to the physician. He is often puzzled by cases which would be clear to him if he could inspect the inner organism and could cure his patient if he could see what was in the man. Happily for us, our spiritual maladies can always be cured by the Great Physician, who, as we are assured, "needs not that any should testify of man for he knows what is in man." (John 2: 25.)

The Kryptophone.

AN instrument which the inventor calls the kryptophone is credited with remarkable powers, by scientific men who recently witnessed experiments with it. Its invention was made known some years ago, but owing to some defects in construction it failed to fulfil the promises made for it. Since then it has been perfected to such a degree that it is now regarded as promising successful practical results in the line marked out by its inventor. In the make up of this peculiar apparatus a very sensitive receiving diaphragm is so disposed that it will respond to and transmit air vibrations produced by any noise to a distant telephone, an alarm bell being provided at the receiving station to attract the attention of the attendant. The sensitiveness of the device is said to be such that, with the receiving diaphragm immersed in a body of water, the pulsations of a steamboat from two to three miles distant are readily discernible, and other tests show its sensitive capacity in giving warning of noises at a distance. This is in line with the telescope, the telephone and other inventions. Man is always trying to extend the powers of his body and find aids for his senses. It is much to be wished that he would avail himself of the greatest of all such powers, the power of faith by which he would perceive more than he can see. (Heb. 11: 1.)

A Deluded Slave.

A REMARKABLE case is set down for hearing in the Circuit Court of Booneville, Mo. The plaintiff is an aged negress who, before the war, was the slave of a man now residing in that town. She claims that during the war, of which she heard only vaguely, the family having kept her secluded from people of her own race, she was constantly employed in domestic service. She did not know anything of the emancipation proclamation nor had any idea that she was concerned in the issues of the war. The family had frequently removed, but she had never been permitted wherever they were to have any acquaintances and, as she could not read, she did not learn from the newspapers that she was free. She has continued to serve the family as a domestic servant down to a recent date, but has never received any compensation for her services. A short time ago she learned, to her astonishment, that she had not really been a slave for well-nigh thirty years and she immediately quitted her servitude. Some friends have entered suit on her account for $1400 back wages at the rate of five dollars a month. Public opinion in the neighborhood is strongly in her favor and it is believed that she will win her suit. It was a cruel wrong that the woman should have been kept in ignorance so long of the fact that she might be free. The same kind of wrong is perpetrated on many people who suppose that they cannot be set free from the thraldom of Satan. They do not know the power of him who redeemed them. (Jude 24.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Samoan Islands support the churches and ministers in their own islands, and last year raised $10,000 to send the Gospel to other lands.

Received from M. M. N., Chicago, one dollar for Rev. J. P. Lane, the missionary of the American Sunday School Union, who lost his property in the recent cyclone.

The friends of Rev. Geo. C. Needham will be glad to hear that he is improving in health. He hopes to be ready for full work in October. His residence is changed from Philadelphia to East Northfield, Mass.

Four grandsons of Garibaldi, the Italian patriot, have been placed by Garibaldi's son in the Methodist Episcopal Institute in Rome to be educated. The father said in entering them, "I do not want my boys to be taught by the Romans."

Dr. John G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides, whose preaching many of our readers have had the pleasure of listening to during the past few months, has given to the New Hebrides Mission $25,000, which he received from the publishers of his autobiography.

A revival has been going on at Northfield, Conn., under the labors of Evangelist E. A. Lawrence. So much religious interest has never been known in the town before. Many of the converts are heads of families and some of them had been regarded as indifferent to religious influence.

Rev. E. P. Telford has closed the series of meetings he has been holding in Lowell, Mass. They were very successful, and continued with growing interest fo two weeks. Thence the Evangelist went to Lawrence, Mass., where he has arranged to preach in both the Park and St. Paul's M. E. Churches.

Twelve students of Bangor Seminary have undertaken to hold special services in various churches in Maine during the Summer vacation

Evangelist Wyckhoff has been holding meetings through the past month at Beechwood, Ill., and neighboring villages. In many places where there is no church the services have been held in barns.

Rev. George R. Graff, pastor of the Methodis Episcopal Church of Morrisville, Pa., writes that many souls have been brought into the church in the revival which accompaniedthe labors of Evangelists Grant and Tullar of the Central Union Mission, Washington, D.C.

The programme for the Ocean Grove (N. J.) meetings has been issued. Among the items are: An Oration, by Dr. J. Embury Price of New York, on July 4; The W. C. T. U. meeting on July 6; King's Daughters July 8; Sunday School Assembly, July 11-20; Chautauqua L. and S. C. graduation day, July 20; Rev. Edgerton Young's Lectures on Indian Life, July 24; Home Missionary Society's meeting, July 26; anniversary Services, July 31; Epworth League Convention, Aug. 1; Memorial Day, Aug. 7; Young People's Day, Aug. 13; Women's Encampment, Aug. 16-18.

A praise and thanksgiving service was held a few evenings ago, at the Hebrew Christian Church, 17 St. Mark's place, New York. Among the subjects mentioned as causes for gratitude were: The continued blessing of God on the work; the satisfactory examination of two converts of the mission, one in medicine and the other in theology; the good work being done in mission labor among Jews by Dr. Faust, who was converted under Mr. Freshman, and for the recovery of Mrs. Freshman from a severe illness. In spite of much opposition from influential Jews in the city, Mr. Freshman's work is growing and extending.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

PREACHER, SUFFERER, CONQUEROR.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, June, 4, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

"The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary," etc. Isa. 50: 4-9.

VEN a casual reader of this chapter will see that it consists of two parts. The second part begins with the first verse of the section chosen as the text. In the first part we have a statement of the reasons for the rejection and the punishment of God's ancient people. They are considered at this time as exiles in Babylon. It is implied in these verses that their punishment was not the result of caprice on the part of God, but of disloyalty on the part of the people themselves. God had both the will and the power to save them. That his hand was not shortened is evident because he was able to dry up the sea, and to change rivers into a desert; but the people had erred from his ways and had brought his displeasure and righteous punishment upon themselves.

With the beginning of the fourth verse a speaker is introduced who makes great claims for himself. He asserts that he is eminently qualified for the office to which he is called; that he is amply that he will meet the fierce opposition to which is exposed with great meekness, and that he will finally triumph over all opposition because his trust is in God and in him alone. We are not surprised that this portion of the chapter has been referred to various persons by different interpreters. The best interpretation, however, is that which concludes that this speaker was none other than the Messiah. Some have supposed that Isaiah himself is here the subject of discussion; but he is not known to have had any of the religious experiences which are here described. Neither is there any other prophet, so far as we know, to whom this language is appropriate. In almost all ages of the Church the majority of unprejudiced interpreters have referred this language to the Messiah. It cannot be denied that all that is here said naturally applies to Christ. Every description of his humiliation and meekness, of the opposition which he encounters, of the faith which he exercises, and of the victory which he finally secures applies with exactness to Jesus Christ. Indeed, some parts of this description can by no possibility, except by a violation of all reasonable rules of interpretation, be applied to any other than the Messiah. In the latter part of the eleventh verse where the speaker threatens to punish his foes, the language certainly cannot be used of Isaiah or of any other prophet, but is immediately applicable to Jesus Christ as King in Zion and ruler over men. All doubt regarding Old Testament prophecies is removed when we find Christ making the application to himself. It is a literal fulfilment of this ancient prophecy. We know, too, that he was perfectly endowed to perform the work which is attributed to the speaker introduced in the text; we know that Christ was entirely obedient to God; that he submitted to all the injuries inflicted on him; that he endured the opposition of men trusting in God, and, in a word, that all these prophecies have in him and in him only their complete fulfilment. We have then, in the first place, Jesus Christ brought before us in the fourth

A Great Preacher

We are accustomed to think of Christ as a preacher in connection with the sermon on the Mount, and with the delivery of his parables, [illegible] Testament. It is at first blush somewhat startling to find Christ described as a great preacher in a passage in Isaiah. We know that Isaiah was the most evangelical of all the prophets; that he saw the glory of the coming Christ as no other prophet of his time, and that he described events which were to occur in the ministry of the Messiah as if he were in their midst at the time of their occurrence. He places himself constantly in the very time of the events which he narrates; this method of description is somewhat peculiar to Isaiah. We have other instances in the Old Testament, as in the case of the "angel of the Lord" who preached at Bochim, of the preaching of Christ in Old Testament times. Without any reasonable doubt, it was none other than Jesus whose touching sermon led to the giving of the name "Bochim," the place of weepers. It is striking indeed that we should find the Christ of God as a great preacher in this ancient day. In like manner we have him introduced to us as a great preacher in this passage in Isaiah. The more we examine the passage the more are we satisfied that the Messiah is the speaker now presented to our consideration.

The first characteristic of Christ as a great preacher is that he has "the tongue of the learned." The more literal rendering of the phrase is the tongue of those who are instructed, or the tongue of the truly eloquent. The entire passage shows us that Christ was endowed of God in a remarkable manner. It is evident that the reference here is not to knowledge of human science, but to the knowledge of that higher and nobler science, the science of salvation. Touching that matter he was qualified as never was man before nor since; he was endowed with and unparalleled eloquence. He made known the will of God as one who had dwelt in the bosom of God. He spoke of the spiritual world as one who had long dwelt there, and was as familiar with eternity as with time. Never man spake as did Jesus Christ touching all matters spiritual. He enforced the claims of God with sublime simplicity, with tearful tenderness, and with awful authority. All his discourses prove the superiority of his knowledge, the tenderness of his spirit, and the affection of his heart. No one can read his discourses, and especially his sermon on the Mount, without feeling that he is breathing a new atmosphere, looking upon a new world, and hearing the divinest man who ever visited this earth. The sermon on the Mount is matchless. It lifts itself above all human discourses as Mont Blanc in Alpine ranges. His other discourses stand around this mountain peak as the white robed sister mountains stand around their peerless queen, Mont Blanc. All who are Christ's disciples may share in his knowledge of God and in his eloquence toward men. Good Matthew Henry has well said God made man's mouth and God alone can make it eloquent. We know that God made the speech of the hesitating Moses mighty to terrify and to subdue Pharaoh; and God made the words of Paul mighty to the pulling down of the strongholds of sin. All great thinkers on religious things catch their inspiration and receive their instruction from Christ who stands in the foremost place among the thinkers and teachers of the world.

The Sympathizer.

Another characteristic of Christ as a great preacher is here given.—He knew "how to speak a word in season." The Hebrew here is "that he might know how to strengthen with a word the weary." Christ knew how to sustain, to comfort, and to refresh weary souls by his wise counsels and by his precious promises. He knew how to lift the burden from hearts weary with care and laden with sin. He knew how to lessen the sorrows of life; how to impart the comforts of the divine presence, peace, and power. Whether the weary were burdened with sin or with the inevitable sorrows of life he knew how to lighten the load and to increase the strength. There is marvelous power in a sympathetic word. Too little do we appreciate its influence, and too seldom do we impart its blessings. There is a sanctified tact which is as rare as it [illegible] law of etiquette. Men who learn to practice this rule learn the secret of gentlemanly courtesy, because they have felt the impulses of Christian affection. Grace was poured from Christ's lips, and a sympathetic heart beat in his bosom. His whole life is an illustration of these truths. He came to remove burdens by forgiving transgressions. He learned obedience himself by the things which he suffered. He knew how to say, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The sight of thousands groaning under their burdens was enough to break his loving heart; but he taught us to cast our burdens upon him assuring us that he cared for us and would sustain us.

He knew how to speak the seasonable word to those burdened with the intellectual doubts connected with religious faith and providential experience. His hands swept every chord of the human heart. There were times in his own life when he seemed to stand over great chasms of darkness and doubt connected with God's dealings with men. Precious thoughts are suggested by Christ's sympathy with those burdened with the intellectual mysteries of revelation and of experience. In all times of doubt we can take his hand, kneel at his feet and say with him, "Even so Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight." If men burdened with intellectual difficulties would but cast themselves at his feet he would take them and their difficulties and carry both, giving them sweet peace, clear vision, and joyous faith. He knows also of mortal infirmities. He knew what it was to be weary in body with the toils of the day; what it was to lay his head upon the wooden pillow in the hinder part of the ship and sleep the sleep of utter weariness. It is true he did not know by personal experience the infirmities brought on by old age, but it is quite certain that he knew them by his broad sympathy and by his appreciative affection. Never was there a burden-bearer like Jesus Christ. He knows how to speak peace to the sorrowing. He calls his sheep by name. He speaks to each believer with a select, a special, a discriminating tenderness.

Thou art as much his care as if beside
Nor man, nor angel lived in all the earth;
The sunbeams pour alike their glorious tide
To light a world, or wake an insect's birth;
They shine and shine with unexhausted store;
Thou art thy Saviour's darling—seek no more.

Every minister, and every other worker for Christ, should have this sanctified endowment in some measure at least. It should be coveted as one of the best gifts; it may be possessed partially by all believers, and it may become an element of almost irresistible power.

Another characteristic of Christ as a great preacher was that he had an open ear for instruction—"He wakeneth morning by morning: he wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned." The thought here is that as a pupil he was wakened early every morning to receive instruction from his teacher. As applied to Christ the teaching is that he was eminently endowed by divine instruction for his redemptive work; that he could teach men as one who was himself taught in that he could wisely impart because he daily received wisdom from God. He was attentive to the divine commands, and so was able to impart divine truth. As taught of God he would be thoroughly qualified to teach men. As a docile disciple of God he was fitted to be an authoritative teacher of men for God. The open ear is as important for a religious teacher as the ready tongue. The man who is to teach his fellow-men must be a willing pupil awakened by God morning by morning, as an earthly school-master arouses his pupils and gives them necessary instruction. Except we have an open ear to hear God's voice, a ready tongue in teaching men is a source of evil rather than of good. Christ received that he might bestow. In one hemisphere of his life, heart and hand were open to receive from God; in the other hemisphere they were open to impart to men. He who is to preach the preaching which God bids must receive the teaching which God gives. No man can claim the authority rightly belonging to a teacher, except he have first rendered the obedience rightly claimed of a disciple. It is instructive also to observe that this teaching was a daily privilege and duty; this docile pupil was awakened morning by morning to receive instruction. Every day requires new wisdom for new responsibilities; every day needs a new baptism of grace and strength for new duties and burdens. Strength for the day is to be imparted by the day. Happy is that man who begins every day with God; who gives his first thoughts into God's bosom and receives from God's lips his first commands for the day's duties.

We behold, in the second place, from verses five and six, Christ as

A Submissive Sufferer—

"The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting." Christ willingly undertook the solemn and blessed task of making God known to men. He was in himself the Incarnate Word; he was God. He came not to do his own will, but the will of God who had sent him; he came to bear all forms of trial, and to suffer all kinds of reproach. One might have supposed that a preacher such as has been described would receive at once the submission and homage and the affection of his hearers. One might have expected that in coming to earth all men would hasten to lay their willing service at the feet of the Lord's Christ. But it was far otherwise. When the Son came, men said, "this is the heir let us kill him." Perhaps it would not be otherwise to-day should the Son of God visit this city and other cities in our land and in the world! Men now would oppose, deride and possibly murder the Lord of glory.

We have in these two verses a statement of Christ's experimental knowledge of God's instruction—"The Lord God hath opened mine ear." Experimental knowledge is the profoundest knowledge possible to men. Indeed it is the only knowlege which is truly worthy the name. All other knowledge is superficial. As the word itself implies, it is knowledge that comes out of us because it has first gone through and through us; it is knowledge that has come to us as the result of actual trial. It is the deepest, broadest, highest, and truest of all forms of knowledge.

Experimental Preaching

is sometimes spoken of with depreciation and occasionally with a sneer; but it is preaching that is high as heaven and deep as hell, it is preaching that sounds the depths of all human existence; it is preaching which, in a sense, is as deep and high as the love of God himself; it is the most unanswerable of all kinds of argumentative instruction. Thrice happy is he who knows God in this experimental way. All the Pharisees in Jerusalem could not make the man who once was blind and was cured by Jesus to doubt the reality of that cure. They might perplex him regarding many difficult questions, but he who knew that once he was blind and that now he saw, could stand on that knowledge as firmly as on the everlasting rock. Would to God that all who hear or read these words might know Jesus Christ by a personal experience! This is not to know about Christ, but it is to know Christ; it is to enter into his life, to catch his spirit, and to be made over again in his image.

We also have here an expression of the Messiah's loyal service—"I was not rebellious neither turned away back." Christ clearly foresaw the difficulties he must encounter; he knew that he was to be despised and rejected of men; he knew that he was to be a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, but he pressed forward bearing every burden and discharging every duty. We are to follow his example in this respect as in all other relations of life. The man who fears difficulties will never accomplish impossibilities. There is apparently a solid wall across every path of duty, but as we walk up to it we see a cleavage, and as we resolutely approach it the wall parts and we pass through. Those who follow God into the Red Sea of difficulties will see that sea rising in crystal walls on each side of their path while on dry land. We have here also an illustration of our Lord's patient obedience. He submitted to be scourged giving his back to the smiters. He submitted to be buffetted, giving his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; he endured the humiliation of being spat upon, hiding not his face from shame and spitting. he thus received the greatest indignity and the highest insult that could be conceived among an oriental people. To cut off the beard or to pluck it out was an insult which no words could adequately describe. To be spat upon or even to spit in the presence of an oriental, was an insult of the most degrading character. But these acts of indignity were inflicted on the meek and lowly Christ. One's heart grows tender as he thinks of the indignities which the Lord endured on our behalf. What have we done for him who endured so much for us? Was there ever sufferer so innocent, so patient, and so heroic as Jesus Christ? Seeing and knowing all that his incarnation implied, he came willingly into our world, assumed our nature, bore our sins and died the just for the unjust that he might bring us unto God. Oh, that the sight of this submissive sufferer might awaken your love, arouse your conscience, and finally consecrate your lives to his holy service! Oh, divine Saviour and august sufferer, may thine example rebuke our coldness and lead us to lay ourselves in sweet submission at thy pierced feet!

In verses seven, eight and nine, we behold in the third place, Christ as A Triumphant Conqueror.

Christ was the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world; still he was evermore the lion of the tribe of Judah; he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows; still he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. We love to think of Christ in both of these characters, at both extremes of human experience, as both weak and helpless, as mighty and as glorious. We like a God of power, a God who can bring things to pass, a God who can confound his foes and glorify his friends. We have here the Messiah's confidence in God—"The Lord God will help me." He knew that because of the divine help he would not be confounded and that he would finally triumph over all his foes. God gloriously helps those who trust in him, and who confidently walk in the path of obedience. The Messiah realized that "he is near who justifieth me." He would, therefore, set his face like a flint, and he could resolutely defy the contempt and scorn of all his foes. God was near him in every hour of trial and justified him in every experience of human derision and falsity. God proved him to be righteous,

Vindicated His Character, and declared his innocence in the face of every earthly foe. At his baptism, God by an audible voice, declared him to be the beloved Son. In all his miracles, God showed that they were wrought by his power. At his trial, Pilate declared him to be innocent; even Pilate's wife, that noble Roman lady who was loyal to him when disciples fled, declared that he was a just man. The Roman centurion, who attended his crucifixion, affirmed that he was a Son of God. His resurrection declared him to be the Son of God with power. God thus approved his course, vindicated his character, and confirmed all his claims. Well may he here defy his foes, challenging any man to contend with him. His confidence in God is unshaken, and his assurance in his own integrity is unquestioned. The language here employed is suggested by trials in courts of justice. It is a solemn call upon any legal adversary to enter the tribunal and prefer his accusation against the Messiah. He is willing to meet such an adversary in the lists. He dares him to a trial of strength and skill; he challenges him to enter a legal action against him. He is assured that he can put all disputants to silence. He is willing to meet foot to foot, shoulder to shoulder with any adversary who dares contend with him. Claims such as these every believer may make. Christ speaks in their name; he speaks as their fearless champion. Who dare be an enemy to those to whom Christ is a friend? Who dare contend with him for whom Christ appears as advocate? Let us once more ring out of the Apostle Paul, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" These are stirring words. They ring out like the blast of a trumpet; they stir the blood like strains of martial music. We have been too timid and modest; we have too often asked the pardon of all creation for daring to be followers of the Lord Jesus. We ought to defy the world, the flesh and the devil. We owe the devil nothing but contempt and disobedience. Christ overcame him, and in Christ we also may overcome. All our enemies, as we are here taught, "shall wax old as a garment;" and the Lord Christ shall survive all their opposition. His cause shall live; his truth shall triumph, but his foes shall perish.

The Defiant Challenge

Once more we stand in the presence of this divine preacher. Let the voice of the earthly preacher be forgotten; let his presence be unseen; behold him who spake as never man spake; behold him in all the glory of his humanity; in all the immaculate purity of his divinity. Behold him as the babe in Bethlehem; as the boy in Jerusalem, as the beloved Son in the waters of baptism; as the divine physician; as the good shepherd. Behold him bowing in Gethsemane's garden; hanging on Calvary's cross; rising from Joseph's tomb; and ascending to his vacant place on the Father's throne! I ask you, in his sacred presence and by his divine authority, "What will ye do with Jesus who is called the Christ?" Oh, receive him as your Saviour? Sit at his feet as your divine teacher, then you also shall have the tongue of the learned, shall speak seasonable words to the weary, and shall finally triumph over every adversary, coming off more than conquerors through him who has loved you and given himself for you.

THE PLACE GETHSEMANE.

From the German of Heinrich Richter.

IN Olive's shade I know a spot
Far from the world's loud bustle,
Where Kedron murmurs low its thought,
And trees responsive rustle.
There one looks not from distant height,
On field and wood and sea,
But scans beneath a holier sight:
The place Gethsemane.

In midnight deep, lo! on his knees,
As though some dark transgressor;
Beneath the heavy olive-tree—
Our Priest and Intercessor!
His face uplifted to the skies,
His tears, a streaming flood,
He "Abba! Abba! Father!" cries,
And sweats great drops of blood.

Gethsemane! How just the name!
Lo! here the wine-press treading,
The Woman's Seed, for us who came,
Earth's vale of sorrow threading.
By anguish, here from him was wrung
This balm, our wounds to bless;
The fountain whence our cleansing sprung,
The oil of holiness!

Oh! Lord thou hast, to find me peace,
Within that valley sought it;
From my fell foes to win release,
This battle set, and fought it.
And now henceforth where'er I go,
To what e'er clime I flee,
No place like this can be, I know:
The place Gethsemane!

And should I, oh! in weaker hours
Be into sin's sleep falling,
To save me from infernal powers,
Oh, let me hear thee calling!
Teach me that word: "Thy will be done!"
Thy will, whate'er it be;
For thus by thee was vict'ry won:
The place Gethsemane!

Deserted, if in bitter strait,
By all the world forsaken;
Alone I'll agonize and wait,
My faith in God unshaken.
Whatever anguish I may feel,
Is still well known to thee:
Still there I see thee for me kneel;
The place Gethsemane!

WANDERING SHEEP.

JESUS, thy wand'ring sheep behold:
Poor souls that cannot find the fold.

Lost are they now, and scattered wide,
With no kind shepherd near to guide.

Thou, only thou, the kind and good,
Can guard the flock and give them food.

Thy glory only let them seek;
Let them believe and therefore speak.

The Closing Dispensation.

The Characteristics of this Dispensation and the Signs Indicating its Nearing End.

BY REV. THOMAS NEWBERRY.*

WHEN Christ made that remark about the destruction of the Temple which so startled his disciples and which was used as evidence against him at his trial, the disciples put three questions to him (Matt. 24: 3), the answers to which have a vital interest for us in these days. The disciples asked:—First, "When shall these things be?" That is, when these great buildings should be thrown down, and not one stone be left upon another. The Lord's answer to this question is not recorded in Matt. 24, nor in Mark 13, but in Luke 21: 7, 20, in answer to a similar question, "What sign will there be when these things shall come to pass?" To which the Lord replies, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." This was accomplished in A.D. 70, when Jerusalem and the Temples were destroyed by the Roman armies.

The second question is, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" His coming has a two-fold aspect: he will come as Son of God to receive his Church and take his Bride, he also will come as Son of Man to receive and establish the kingdom; of this coming there will be many visible signs. This will be at the end or completion of the age, and answers the third question.

In the first fourteen verses of Matt. 24 the Lord Jesus gives us the character of this present dispensation. Whilst he speaks of his return as the next event to be expected, with nothing between, "I go to prepare a place for you, I come again," still he has given them to understand it is "after a long time" he comes to take account of his servants (chap. 25: 19.) They must be prepared to "wait" as well as to "watch." There are seven particulars to be observed.

First. "Many shall come in my name, saying, 'I am Christ,' and shall deceive many." (ver. 5). The Apostle John tells us that in his time there were many antichrists (I. John 2:18); they have characterized the whole period from beginning to end. Perhaps no age has lacked its antichrists, who have usurped the place and prerogative of the Lord Jesus.

Second. "And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars; see that ye be not troubled, for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet." It is not during the present dispensation that men will beat their spears into pruning hooks; the Church is not going to establish a millennium of univeral peace, but wars and rumors ot wars are to be expected. It has been common to say, when there has been a great war, that the end of the world has come. These things must come to pass, but the end is not yet.

Third. "And there shall be famines." Though God is long suffering and kind, sending his rain on the evil and on the good, giving fruitful seasons, and filling men's hearts with food and gladness; still, there are times when he makes men feel that they are dependent on him for their daily bread.

Fourth. "Pestilences and earthquakes in divers places." Though there are at the present time so many sanitary arrangements, yet, as in former ages, notwithstanding all, at times pestilences and epidemics prevail, and earthquakes are of frequent occurence.

Fifth. Persecutions. The disciples of Christ, for his sake, are hated of all nations. The Gospel has been universally met with persecution, and has carried division into families who have betrayed and hated one another. Not even in our day has persecution wholly ceased. The Christ who would be consistent does not escape opposition or ridicule.

Sixth. False prophets. "And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many." This corresponds with other predictions of the last days of the Church, when perilous times should come (II. Tim. 3: 1), when "there shall be false teachers among you." (II. Peter 2: 1.) Surely this warning is needed now; many false prophets and teachers are arising, and many are being deceived.

Seventh. Lawlessness and lukewarmness. "And because iniquity (lawlessness) shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved." The mystery of lawlessness began to work in the apostle's time; how much more is it abounding now—is it not pervading all nations? Hence the importance of the words of the Lord Jesus addressed to the Church in Philadelphia, "Behold, I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."

THE CLAIMS OF MISSIONS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing June 18. Mal.3:1-12

MORE money is being spent in the cause of Foreign Missions than at any previous period of the history of the Church. On this account there is cause for rejoicing. There is less cause, however, when the comparison of periods is left out of consideration. The proper question for every age is whether all is being done that might be done, rather than whether the present is doing more than the past. It is a solemn fact that every society engaged in the work of sending the Gospel to those who are ignorant of it, could do that work on a larger scale and more efficiently if it had more money. In China, in Africa, in India and in all the fields of missionary effort, the force engaged is ridiculously inadequate to the work. In Persia, in Thibet, in Afghanistan and other countries there is not more than one missionary to three hundred thousand persons. Yet more men are willing to go if there were money to send them. When, therefore, the question is asked why these peoples have not heard the Gospel, the answer must be that the Church has kept its money instead of sending out preachers. There is no escape from that fact. In the passage selected for the topic, the prophet reproaches his people for like negligence. Bring the tithes into the storehouse, he urges, and you will have a blessing. A similar appeal needs to be made now. Under the Mosaic dispensation, a tenth of every man's income belonged to God; is it possible that under the Christian dispensation a smaller proportion is given for the Lord's work? Many a man does not give the half of a tenth, even when he includes in his reckoning the cost of a pew in a church, which is really rather money spent on his own comfort or convenience, than it is an offering to God. "Ye have robbed me in tithes and offerings," is the indictment and it has its application now.

It was recommended that $75,000 annually be secured to carry on the work of the International Committee for 1893 and 1894. Resolutions were also passed protesting against the Sunday opening of the World's Fair.

Before the opening of the Convention, a four days' Conference of Association secretaries was held in Louisville, Ky., over two hundred being in attendance.

A THRIVING CANADIAN Y. M. C. A.

A LITTLE meeting in a business office in Hamilton, Ont., one evening twenty-six years ago, planted a seed which has grown to a great tree. There were only seven persons present, all young men, but they were Christians thoroughly in earnest and with a clearly defined object in view. They were concerned for the spiritual welfare of the young men of the city and were anxious to win them for Christ. They committed the matter in prayer to God and then formed themselves into a Young Men's Christian Association. From this nucleus, came the present thriving, prosperous, influential institution, which has been a blessing to vast numbers. Five hundred young men are now on its membership rolls and many have gone forth from its doors to become ministers, evangelists or workers for Christ in other fields. The original plan which has been followed throughout, was to attract young men by offering them facilities for filling up their leisure time with educational, healthful and religious occupations, which would tend to the development of perfect manhood in soul, mind and body. This plan was pursued with energy; Bible classes and athletics, a Chautauqua Reading Circle and Evangelistic services, popular lectures on scientific subjects, concerts and technical classes have been employed for the advancement of the work and in one form or other 250 young people have actively engaged in the service.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF HAMILTON, ONT.

The necessity of a suitable building for the home of the Association, was realized early in the movement. The young men, however, had the good sense to wait until the condition of the finances justified its erection. They have now a home, a picture of which appears on this page, which with its furniture and appliances cost $40,000 and the whole of which is paid except a small mortgage of $4,000. An effort was commenced last winter to clear off this sum and raise a further sum of one thousand dollars to develop the gymnasium, baths and recreation ground. So well-known and appreciated is the work that the Association has done in the city, that already four of the five thousand dollars needed, have been pledged. This success encourages the young men to hope that that not only will the whole amount be raised, but that their project of obtaining an educational endowment will be realized. That help would render the institution secure and its beneficent work would be still further extended.

In the afternoon there will be three simultaneous services in the Music Hall, the Epworth Memorial Church and West Side, to each of which eminent speakers are assigned. The evening session will be occupied by addresses from Dr. John. W. Hamilton, of Cincinnatti, and Dr. A. J. Palmer, of New York; the "Watch night" sermon will be delivered by Bishop C. H. Fowler. There will be a love feast at eleven o'clock and a farewell consecration service at 11:45 P. M., led by Bishop Fitzgerald.

A NORTHFIELD CONFERENCE FOR YOUNG WOMEN

THE following letter from Mr. D. L. Moody which has been sent us for publication will interest many of our readers:

Since 1886 the College young men of the world have met at Northfield for a Summer Conference on Bible study and Christian work. The influence of these conferences has been so widespread, and the benefits to those attending and to other young men, have been so manifest, that an urgent request has come from the young women of some of the leading educational institutions for a similar conference of young women, to be held at the same place this year.

The enlarged advantages of higher education now enjoyed by a greater number of young women than ever before have opened up wide avenues of opportunity and responsibility in the line of Christian service, which call for the highest type of consecrated Christian womanhood. It is therefore eminently fitting that an International Conference of young women should be held, having for its object the study of the most vital questions concerning their spiritual life, the scope of their power of usefulness, and the best methods by which the greatest efficiency therein may be attained.

An earnest and cordial invitation is therefore extended to all College young women and others interested or engaged in any line of Christian work, to meet in conference at Northfield, June 22–29. As this will be a representative gathering, College Presidents, Faculty members and student organizations, are requested to interest themselves in securing a representation of their institutions.

All arrangements for the conference will be made by the International Committee of the Young Women's Christian Associations, and all communications sent to them at Venetian Building, Chicago, will receive prompt attention.

NOTES OF THE ORDERS.

The Warrenton, Va., Baptist Young People's Union which was started six months ago with fifteen members now numbers thirty-five besides associate members. The Pastor, Rev. F. R. Boston, is president.

The officers of the King's Daughters have issued a warning to the members of the Order and other young girls against accepting offers of engagements as stenographers, clerks, ticket-takers, or other positions for the World's Fair. Designing persons are plotting to entice girls to Chicago for wicked purposes.

North Avenue M. E. Church, Allegheny, Pa., was filled the other day with the delegates of the Epworth League of the District. The report showed that there were thirty-two Chapters in the District, eleven of which had been organized within a year. The increase of membership during the year had been over a thousand.

There are ninety-five Young Men's Christian Associations in France, with 1154 active members and 1127 associates. The growth of the past year is very substantial, and is attributable in a large degree to the energy of the General Secretary, Mr. J. Hughes, who since his appointment in 1889, has given much time and labor to the work. During the present year he is giving all his time.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Cork, Ireland, has issued its annual report showing that the evangelistic department has been much blessed. The missionary branch goes on well. Two members have gone to Mr. Moody's college as missionary students. The Quaiboe Mission also goes on well. At home open-air preaching, Bible class, and other work goes on steadily.

The B. Y. P. U. of Omaha, Neb., has a regular plan for securing variety in its meetings. The first Monday of the month is Missionary or Conquest night; the second Monday a study in the Life of Christ; the third a literary and social night; the fourth a consecration meeting; the fifth, when there is a fifth Monday in the month, is devoted to the discussion of some doctrinal subject duly selected at the previous meeting.

AT the New Jersey B. Y. P. U. Convention, recently held at Camden, the following papers were read: "Methods of Work in Young People's Societies," by Dr. W. W. Boyd, of Newark. "The Uses and Abuses of the Lord's day," by Miss Ida Emmons; "The Importance of Adopting a System of Benevolence," by Edwin Smith; "Shall we Leave Mission Work to our Elders?" by Miss Edith Voorhees; "Young People and State Missions," by Rev. D. DeWolf, State Missionary of Newark; "Opportunities," by Miss Florence G. Sarles, of Stelton. A very large number of delegates were present.

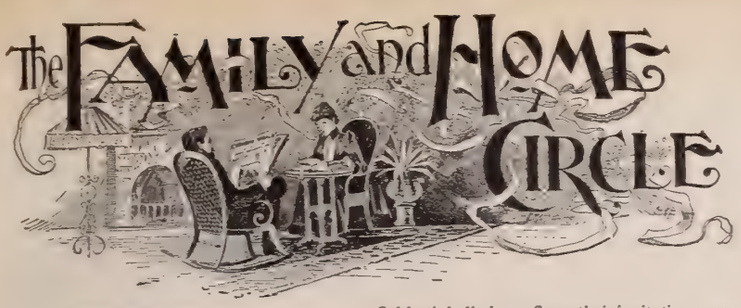
The Loving Service Circle of King's Daughters at Flushing, N. Y., has adopted five rules for the conduct of its members which would do no harm if they were generally adopted. They are are: "Defend the absent; avoid unkind criticism; charity; avoid the use of slang; try to make at least one person happy every day." The Circle looks after the poor of the neighborhood and has two families partially dependent upon it. It has given food regularly every week to one of these families, made articles of clothing for the children, and given them a number of partially worn garments. The Circle has also sent literature to the Flushing Hospital, flowers to the Tenement House Chapter, and to Five Points Mission, New York City. The Circle's last gift was the pulpit furniture, consisting of desk and five chairs, to the new Reformed Church of Flushing.



THE KINGLY GUEST.

HAST thou room for the King in thy house,
If haply he seek thee to-day?
Its chambers are royally fair;
In which wilt thou bid him to stay?
For never, ah! never is mansion so blest,
As one that hath held the dear Lord for its guest.

Hast thou room for the King in thy heart?
It treasureth many a one;
It is crowded and cumbered with care,
It hath sorrow it telleth to none;
Yet, busy, and toilsome, and sad, it shall sing,
If but to its love cometh Jesus the King.

Hast thou ready a room for the King?
It may be he cometh this way,
Defer not thy welcome! Prepare,
If Jesus should seek thee to-day.
Since in house, and in heart, there is never such rest,
As when they have held the dear Lord as their guest.

Neglected Children.

There are Many in Our Own Land who, having neither Churches nor Sunday Schools, are Growing Up like the Heathen.

DIFFICULT as it as it may be for American boys and girls, who have kind parents and comfortable homes, to imagine other children of their own age, growing up like heathen, under the protection of the same starry flag, it is nevertheless true. There are, at the present moment, many small scattered communities in distant Western and Southwestern States which are absolutely destitute of church privileges, and where the Sunday School, as well as the day school, is as yet unknown. It is in such neighborhoods (which may readily be found in the newer sections of Missouri, Kansas, and adjoining States) that the work of the Sunday School missionary is best appreciated. Nearly two years ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the co-operation of its readers, placed an energetic consecrated man in this Southwestern field—the Rev. Geo. W. Sharp—and references to his work have appeared at different times in these columns. He has been greatly blessed in being instrumental in establishing many Sunday Schools and not a few churches in the neglected sections, and all who have united to support this special work—which is essentially a home missionary one—have felt a deep general interest in the result. In those years he has traveled, horseback and afoot, many thousands of miles, organized schools and churches, sometimes in barns and sheds, or in kitchens and rustic parlors, and at times even in the open air under the protecting shadow of some giant tree. The seed thus sown has sprung up and born abundant fruit in many flourishing Sunday Schools and chapels where none previously existed.

But the field is a vast one, and although the missionary efforts of the American Sunday School Union have been unsparing for many years, a great work has yet to be performed before it can be truthfully affirmed that throughout the length and breadth of "Christian America" there is no community without its Sunday School. In his occasional letters from the field, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary has given graphic glimpses of the spiritual barrenness he finds in many localities. Our illustration on this page is a case in point. Here is a group of American boys, (photographed by one of the missionary workers) who till now have never seen either church or Sunday School. To them all days of the week are alike, either for work or sport. No sweet Sabbath bells have flung their invitation across the prairie to their homes. It may even be that the Divine name never falls on their ears unless linked with another. They are, in every essential point, white heathen. Hardly a whit less so than the dusky little boys and girls of interior Africa who never heard the name of Jesus until the missionaries came. This photograph is unique in still another respect: it is a Sunday group. The six lads with gun and dogs, are off to spend the sacred day on the prairie hunting! They know no better; have never been taught anything else, and have no compunctions whatever. Is not this a pitiful showing for a country that professes to uphold the religion of Jesus of Nazareth? There are thousands of other boys in the same condition of ignorance and semi-savageism. They are worth saving and the best and readiest way to do it is to plant Sunday Schools among them, where the young hearts not yet hardened in vice, will turn to the Saviour and learn to love him.

Ugliness Not Necessary.

DESPITE all that is said and written nowadays regarding grace and beauty in all things pertaining to daily life, it is astonishing how many people seem still to struggle with the notion that ugliness is or ought to be somehow synonymous with virtue. Only the other day a young woman, the mother of a child who wore painfully ill-chosen and ill-fitting garments, was heard lecturing another young mother on her manifest extravagance in dressing her child. Finally the latter began to defend herself. "You," she said, "are wrong in your manner of reckoning extravagance. My child has many changes and is picturesquely dressed because I give the matter some thought, and have taste to make all her clothes myself. You may regard my doing so as a waste of time, if you will, but it is not extravagance. I am willing to compare expenses in the course of a year, and prove that I expend the least. It costs just as much to to produce ugliness as beauty in dress, and bad taste often displays more vanity than good taste, only it lacks the perception to see its own foibles.

Perseverance.

"YEARS ago, when a boy," writes a correspondent, "I remember that on a bright spring morning at the summit of a tall tree was perched a robin, which was trying to sing, but owing to some cause its voice was very hoarse, in fact so hoarse that had I not been near enough to get a good view of the bird it would have been difficult, from the sound, to believe that it was produced by a robin. All day long it screeched out its hoarse notes without any apparent change. The next morning it was again on its perch, still persevering with but slight progress over the efforts of the previous day, and only towards evening was there any marked improvement. On the morning of the third day, it was there again as early as usual, still trying to bring out the full and sweet melody peculiar to its species, which it did finally attain towards evening, and keep up most of the time for several days afterwards.

"This bird was doing what many a brave boy and girl have done who at first have difficulty in mastering their lessons, but through persistent efforts have succeeded. Or again, it was the experience of many on entering the Christian life. Its requires perseverance to break loose from our habitual sins, but when once accomplished, by the aid of God, it is not near so difficult to overcome the evil influence. If God will help a little bird, how much more will he assist man, the highest being of his creation."

Crises in Our Lives.

THERE are in almost every life periods of occurrences that may very truthfully be designated as crises. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive of any human existence so utterly placid and uneventful as to have never been disturbed or changed by some striking incident which has exerted an influence more or less formative on the whole of the career that followed. All who have arrived at middle life, and still more those who have passed it, can recall these crises in their own lives. Most of those in our personal lives are entirely unforeseen, and many of them beyond our control. Some decision made by our parents as to our education or our occupation, some choice made by ourselves when we were young and inexperienced, may have changed the whole tenor of our lives. A marriage or a bereavement, a tide of prosperity or a crash of fortune, a friendship formed or broken, a change of place or scene, a revolution in thought, a sudden accident, a serious illness or some overwhelming influence may have transformed the world for us. Although we cannot foretell what these crises may be, or when they may come, we can do much in the way of preparing ourselves to meet them as they arise. With Divine help as a mainstay, there is no change in human affairs that need excite the fear of the Christian, to whom "all things work together for good."

A Mother's Resolutions.

A LOVING and pious mother framed for herself the following which may serve as a hint to other mothers:

"That the first duty of the day performed by me shall be prayer to God, especially for strength and wisdom to properly instruct, guide and govern my child;

"That I will never permit my child to wilfully disobey me, or treat me with disrespect;

"That I will earnestly strive never to act from an impulse of passion or resentment, but will endeavor to preserve my judgment cool and my feelings calm, that I may clearly see and truly perform my duty to my child;

That I will devote a certain portion of my time each day to self-instruction, in order to be able to properly instruct my child;

"That I will watch over my own temper at all times, cultivate a habit of cheerfulness, and interest myself in the little matters of my child, that I may thereby gain his love;

"That I will devote my time especially to those pursuits which will increase the comfort and happiness of my home and forward the best interests of my child;

"That I will study the health of my child, reading on the subject and asking the advice of those who are more experienced than myself;

"That I will not yield to discouragements from failure, but will persevere, putting faith in the promise of God to all those who earnestly and faithfully strive to do their duty."

HOME HEART-ACHES.

WHEN a respectable family, respectably connected, has the misfortune to be overcome, mortified, humiliated, and tortured by the sad mistakes, bad conduct, or wrongdoings of one of its members, and that member alone blamable, the others should have the sympathy of every true man and woman in the community; and to gather and publish to the world all the little incidents and details connected with the affair, both before and after the committal of the wrong, is in most cases to add to the pain and increase the humiliation of the innocent sufferers, which is unmerciful, unkind, unjust, and cruel. Surely it is not in accordance with the golden rule, "As ye would men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Men and women of delicate and refined sensibilities do not desire to have their deep sorrows and heartrending griefs paraded before an unappreciative world, or published abroad to gratify a low, coarse, and vitiated taste. Deep grief is silent; that which is vociferous is generally shallow and soon exhausts itself, while the other fills the mind and feeds upon itself. "Every heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger meddleth not therewith."

Keep Busy.

THE one thought that comes to the mind of the old man when he speaks to the young, writes Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is this: Oh, that it were possible to make them know how precious are the hours, how fraught with consequences of incalculable importance, which now fill up each and every day of their comparatively easy lives. I would not ask you to relax your attention to the games that fill up your leisure hours; but, I say, let every one with the same energy with which he plays cricket or football, with the same energy with which he applies himself to leaping or running, or to any exercise whatever of his corporeal powers—and he wants very little exhortation, so far as my experience goes, to be energetic with that portion of his duties—let him carry the very same spirit into the work which is intended to develop his mental faculties. The extension of government employments has given an enormous enlargement to what may be called the official classes—in fact, there is a much larger number of professionals competing now than competed together in the days when I came into this world; but, depend upon it, the profession of the clergyman, if it be more arduous than it has ever been, is on that account also nobler than it has ever been.

A Lesson for Young Men.

A MAN died lately at the age of 73, who at the age of 18 began keeping a record which he continued for fifty-two years, which is the best commentary we have seen on the life of a mere worldling. His life was not consecrated to a high ideal.

The book he left states that in fifty-two years this "natural man" had smoked 628,715 cigars, of which he had received 43,692 as presents, while for the remaining 585,023 he he had paid about $10,433.

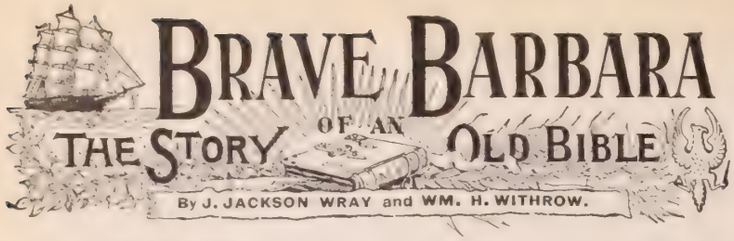
In fifty-two years, according to his bookkeeping, he had drank 28,786 glasses of beer and 36,085 glasses of spirits, for all of which he spent $5,350.

The diary closes with these words:

"I have tried all things, I have seen many, I have accomplished nothing."

A stronger sermon could not be preached than to put this testimony against that of the first missionary.

"I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me in that day."



CHAPTER XIII.

A GIRL-CAPTIVE.

I HAVE already referred to Barbara's family of daughters and I have now to tell of an adventure which befell one of them, the sweet, bright Carrie, her second daughter, whose graces and charms had already begun to fill the mind of young Philip Embury with visions of happiness in relation with her.

One day, a sad day it turned out to be at New Ballygran, Carrie, after her household work and dairy duties were done, had wandered into the forest. The evening was still and fair, and the air was cool and sweet. She wandered further than she knew, and was a little discomposed to find, at length, that her bearings were not clear and that it was growing dusk.

Pausing for a while to think, and to consider in what direction home lay, she was suddenly surprised by a band of Indians, whose presence there, she felt certain, boded no good to her. On the point of fleeing, in any direction, from such unwelcome companions, she was seized and bound and hurried off by the marauders.

The heart of the poor lassie was filled with dread. She had heard that a party of Ojibways had been seen prowling around the settlement in paint and feathers, and evidently bent on hostile deeds. Indeed, more than one of the more distant homesteads on the verge of the settlement had been subjected to thefts of a very serious and unwelcome kind. Ever since the war-time, certain of these red-skinned denizens of the wilderness had given themselves up to a life of outlawry, the natural outcome of the civilized example set them by the two "Christian" antagonists.

Poor Carrie had cause enough to remember them, for a pair of young horses had gone from their own farm some little time before, and had never been recovered; and it was strongly suspected that the Indians had stolen them. As she was being silently and swiftly hurried along through the dusky forest, she wondered with a quick-beating and burdened heart, what design her captors had in view. Her hope was, if hope she had, that their purpose was to hold her in durance until the ransom was paid, which they would doubtless demand, and she found herself wondering how the means could be procured.

Long and far through the night the redskins journeyed, bearing along with them the poor lassie, who was half-dead with weariness and nameless fear. At length they reached an Indian encampment, pitched in a beautiful and open glade, encircled by majestic trees. A quickly flowing stream was making noisy music near by, and Carrie felt her spirits sinking to a lower deep, as she judged from this how far she was, from the silent march of the St Lawrence flowing by her much-loved home.

She was a little relieved to find that she was to be handed over to the care of an Indian woman, who led her to a tent at some little distance from the rest; and still more relieved to find that her swarthy guardian was evidently disposed, judging from deed and smile, to treat her with more consideration than might have been expected from her looks, and certainly far more than her own terrors would have led her to expect. Of course, speech was impossible, for although Carrie, in her wandering life, had picked up a few Indian expressions, they had to do with the dialects of other tribes, and such sounds as those which fell from the tongue of her strange keeper were utterly unintelligible.

One word, which was oft repeated, and which the woman seemed anxious to impress upon her prisoner, Carrie judged to be her jailor's name—"Ooloona;" and the girl was soon assured that the guess was right. The repetition of it invariably won a smile and a nod from its owner, and an attitude as of one who waits for further words. But it was not much to build the basis of a conversation on.

Ooloona provided her guest with food, such as she had, and arranged a bed of ferns for her to sleep on. She, herself, was content to [illegible] a resting-place for what remained of the waning night. Whether it was the sheer weariness that shut up Carrie's eyes in sleep, or whether that was aided by the "good-night" nod and smile with which Ooloona intimated that she should rest in peace, I do not know; but Carrie found herself strangely composed, and murmuring the name "Ooloona," as if to intimate a benediction, she slept. She slept till the sun was shining down over the tree-tops, having climbed so high towards the throne of noon. Or was it that the prayers of Brave Barbara had taken hold of God that night, and so had caused the balsam to be shed on her from the hands of him who "giveth his beloved sleep," aye, and giveth sleep to the beloved of his beloved, in answer to the heart cry that says, "On me and mine!" That, at any rate, was held to be the explanation in after days, and is yet a tradition in the Heck and Embury households, for they still believe, as all "children of the Father" do, that "more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of: for so the whole round world is every way bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

No words of mine can fitly tell the sorrow that filled two homes when the dreadful fact of Carrie's departure came like a thunderclap on the households of New Ballygran. First, the whole immediate neighborhood was scoured in search of the missing girl, who, it was thought, had missed her way, and was "prisoned in the wilderness." Then, messages were sent to more distant homesteads, and a general exploration over a wider area was organized; and so the woesome and vainly wearisome hours of night passed on. The morning came, but with it came no light on the perplexing problem that blanched the faces of the searchers and gave them each a heartbreak. What had become of Carrie?

And what of Barbara, whose mother-heart was rung with anxiety for her absent lassie, and filled with painful apprehensions which she did not dare express? It was eminently characteristic of this woman that, when worn with weary seeking, and while others were snatching refreshment, previous to continuing the search around a wider circle, she should retire to her chamber, "shut to the door and pray to her Father" to send her light and help in the search for her lost darling.

It was still more peculiarly characteristic of Brave Barbara, that in that sacred hour of close wrestling with the angel—she should bring to bear her precious and well-tested talisman, the old German Bible, which had brought her, many and many a time, a message from her Lord and Master. I have no sympathy with that superstitious and unwarrantable handling of the sacred Book which will read in chance texts from a page open at random, a message sent of God; but I do believe, most truly, that to "his own," who live in the "secret of his pavilion," and whose loyal service it is their meat and drink to render him, the Word of the King can be, and is, a guide, an inspiration, a comfort and a help, such as no royal language can address to ear and heart.

And so it came to pass that Brave Barbara talked with God, and as she bowed before the open Book, God talked with her, as he will talk with us if we will keep our ears unstopped by things that hinder, undulled by adverse sounds and voices, and spiritually quick to catch celestial vibrations. And this is what was so distinctly impressed upon her mind that she felt that the Lord had spoken—"Wait on the Lord; be of good courage."

She closed the Book and rose and went forth again to cheer the hearts and strengthen the hands of the searchers for the lost one, and bade them be of good cheer, nor relax their efforts one whit. "Work," said she, "for God is with us." Would that our waiting and hoping and praying had always that word "work" coupled therewith.

And truly God was with them and with the object of their search. On the morning of her captivity, when Carrie awoke to note the sunlight resting on her leafy bed, she woke to note, also, that the eyes of the Indian maiden were bending over her, and that a kindly smile awaited her first look of recognition. Instinctively the musical name of her guardian left her lips. "Ooloona!" she said, lingering on the syllables, as if to convey in them a message of thanks and goodwill. The answer was, a nod, a smile, a courteous motion of the hands; and Carrie wondered how it was that she had obtained favor in the maiden's sight.

She fell to thinking of the pleasant name, Ooloona; to thinking of the pleasant, musical Indian names she had heard aforetime, and how poetical they were. One such name came to her lips; she could, at any rate, show her new-found friend that though she could not speak her language, she knew another Indian word or two, and one, that had greatly impressed her, alike for its own mellow sound and for its bearer's sake; but she was not prepared for what followed. The word was—"Tookalusca!"

Yes, Brave Barbara! At the very time that you were making request and inquiry with the sacred volume "spread before the Lord," God was opening the way for your daughter's release by putting in her mind that talismanic name, and you do well to "wait" with trustful labor and reliant hope.

The face of the Indian maiden glowed with sudden and bright surprise, and the name of "Tookalusca" was repeated by her in a way which revealed more beauty in it than Carrie's unfamiliar fashion of voicing it had done; revealed also, what was subsequently proven, that the young Indian brave who was wounded at Montreal, and who found in Barbara a kindly nurse, and a teacher of the evangel of the gentle Jesus, was the brother of Ooloona. Then a cloud gathered on the speaker's face. She was just about to make some new sign, when there entered the tent an Indian, whom Carrie recognized as one of her captors. Speaking with a rude energy which, so Carrie thought, betokened suspicion, he evidently intimated that the camp was about to be struck, and a second march to be taken without delay.

The next day passed, and still the anxious searchers for the missing Carrie labored in vain. Hope deferred had indeed made their hearts sick, though Barbara, despite the natural grief and distress which filled her heart with sorrow for her darling lassie, held firmly by her prediction that Carrie would be brought back to her. Messengers were about to be sent to the government authorites at Montreal for help in the search, and the two households of the Hecks and Lawrences were gathered in special council. Philip Embury, who bore in his haggard features the token of his bitter grief had declared that he would not rest till he had roused the whole colony to the rescue if such were possible, and then, a strange thing happened.

An Indian was seen approaching the Heck homestead, where the anxious group of Palatines were preparing to resume their mission of rescue. He rode a tired and exhausted steed, which Young Embury soon recognized as one of the pair that had been lost or stolen weeks ago. And, oh, joy, that broke into loud shouts and woke the echoes of the wilderness! Seated in front of the Indian, was the lost Carrie, who, sprang from Tookalusca's arms, and was folded to her mother's breast.

The explanation of this welcome and delightful surprise was soon arrived at. Tookalusca had not entirely broken with his tribe, although he had become a Christian. Barbara's characteristic counsel that he should return to his people when the war was over, and let his light shine among his tribe, compelled him to abide with them; to say nothing of the love he bore his sister Ooloona, and others of his kin. On the other hand, his tribe had good reason for hesitating to utter the anathema that would have cut him adrift. Tookalusca's connection with the Government forces made it worth the while of his tribesmen to retain him.

More than once or twice, through the winter weather, he had gained for their camp supplies of food and other welcome provisions from the Government authorities at Montreal; and the Ojibways knew well the importance of having such a friend at court as would be of service to them in needy days to come. So it was that the Christian Tookalusca still lingered among his old associates, though he had repeated and inviting offers to take up his abode in the citadel he had helped to defend. He would often absent himself for brief spaces of time, to mingle with his white comrades of the war-time, returning with such gifts as won him welcome.

With steadiness of purpose, Tookalusca seized every opportunity of telling his countrymen the story of the Cross, which he had heard from the lips of Barbara, and which had wrought so great a change in his own heart and life. His words were received for the most part with true Indian stolidity, blazing out occasionally into strong antagonism. Three or four of them, however, had been partially won over, and were very willing to listen to the story of "the Great Manitou," who came from the skies on a mission of peace. Among these was Ooloona, who, unlike the general run of Indian women, seemed willing to receive his testimony, remember his words, and ponder them in her heart. No doubt, much of this was due to the love she bore her brother, who had been a notable "brave" among their people, and of whom she was justly proud.

Now it so happened that Tookalusca happened to return to the Ojibway camp, after a prolonged absence, just at the time that the unfortunate maiden, Carrie Heck, had been captured and brought in. Ooloona having been appointed her jailor, would most likely have conversed with her brother on the subject in any case; but Carrie's mention of Tookalusca's name, convinced the Indian maiden that she knew something of her brother's Montreal experiences.

Ooloona had made much of the "great medicine-woman," who had saved her brother's life when in hospital, and had made him to feel the power of the Gospel story, which was now stirring the maiden's own heart. She had a strong conviction that Brave Barbara was somehow linked with her captive, to whom she had taken a kindly liking, so she lost no time in telling Tookalusca all the story.

The young Christian "brave" heard her story, as may well be imagined with the liveliest interest, and at once resolved to effect Carrie's escape. His new principles alone would have impelled him to this course, but when he discovered that the captured maid was stolen from the "wigwam" of Brave Barbara, to whom he owed so much, he was doubly bent on her deliverance. He proceeded with a promptitude inspired of love and gratitude, to carry his purpose into effect.

The one course open to Tookalusca, so far as he could see, and he thought about it long and anxiously, was to steal Carrie out of the hands of her captors. To accomplish this he must use the arts with which he had been familiar in the days of old. Indian silence, secrecy and cunning must be brought to bear, and those in double measure, for those whom he wished to circumvent were Indians like himself, and equally quick in the use of foot, hand, ear and eye. The camp of the Indians was scarcely wrapped in slumber than the conspirators went to work. When the well counterfeited hooting of the brown owl twice broke the stillness of the night, the Indian girl conducted Carrie to a place in the woods hard by. There stood her brother with a horse, one of the pair which had been stolen from New Ballygran and which chanced to be accessible. The two maidens exchanged a tender leave-taking; Carrie, who was a born horsewoman, leaped into her seat behind the Indian; and then, through the long night hours, the rescuing race was run; and on the morrow, as we have seen, Brave Barbara folded her lost lassie to her heart again.

It is needless to say that, for a while, all was gladness and festivity at New Ballygran. It was a holiday thanksgiving, in which it were hard to say whether Barbara and Paul, or Carrie and Philip, or any other of the glad group of happy Palatines, were happier than the glad-hearted Indian who had brought them such a welcome gift from God. Tookalusca had had very little to say; but the gleam in his eye, and the glow on his face, and the way he bent over the outstretched hand of the "great medicine woman," and the few broken words that left his lips, all told the same story, the story of supreme content.

For a short season, life in the new settlement ran smoothly, and nothing transpired to ruffle the even tenor of its way. Tookalusca came and went at ever increasing intervals, so far as the going was concerned. At length he settled down in the midst of his grateful friends, and contented himself with brief but numerous missionary visits to the Indian camp, which could scarcely be "home" to him again. He found in Brave Barbara and her good man Paul, and in Philip Embury especially, willing instructors who were glad to teach him "the way of the Lord more perfectly." With unusual readiness, he became quite an expert in farm labor, finding in John Lawrence and Lucky Mike, comrades entirely to his mind. His sister Ooloona, also under pressure of many hearty messages from the grateful and gentle-spirited Carrie, was induced to join her brother, and found an abiding home among new and faithful friends.

When the Indian maiden was ultimately baptized, for she was not long in seeking and in finding the "good part," there was quite an opposition to all propositions for changing her melodious name for any other. It was finally settled that "Ooloona" should be retained, and as Carrie and she had entered into abiding bonds, that looked as if they would be lifelasting, she became Ooloona Embury.

Nervous Prostration

And Dyspepsia in its worst form pulled me down until I could not eat nor sleep and felt if I did not soon get relief, I should surely die. As a drowning man catches at a straw, I began to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, and when I had used three bottles I had increased from 125 to 150 pounds, was able to work again and felt a thousand times better. My friends are surprised to see such a change. Hood's Sarsaparilla is a wonderful medicine, and its claims are fully justified in my experience." B. C. POWELL, Bigelow, N.Y.

"THE GREAT PHYSICIAN."

A POOR fisherman belonging to the town of Nairn, on the Moray Firth, had for some years been afflicted with a troublesome cough, and, having consulted many doctors, was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. He had heard, however, that there were very skilful medical men in Edinburgh, and he determined, poor though he was, to go there as a last resource. Accordingly, hearing of a vessel in the harbor about to sail for Leith, he applied to the captain to be taken on board, offering to work his passage. During the passage, he told some of the sailors his object in going to Edinburgh; and they advised him to go to Sir James Simpson. It was often a very difficult matter to get an interview with Sir James. But, to his surprise, he was at once admitted to the consulting-room, stated his case, and after a short examination, Sir James said, "You've applied to many doctors already, you said?" "Yes, sir, a good many." "Have you gone to the Great Physician?" The man was silent. "Well, my good man," resumed Sir James, "I advise you to go to him; I am sorry I can do you little good. You had better go home, and just take as good care of yourself as you can." The man was very much affected, for he now understood that his case appeared hopeless. Putting his hand in his pocket and taking out a few coins, he said, "What have I to pay you, doctor?" "My friend," said Sir James, putting his hand kindly on his shoulder, "I don't want any money from you. I ask only an interest in your prayers. Don't forget to go to the Great Physician." After thanking the doctor for his kind reception, and good counsel, he returned to Nairn; and the event soon proved that the illness, as Sir James had seen, was hopeless. There is reason to hope that what the good doctor said to him proved "a word in season."

WENT TO MOCK, STAYED TO PRAY.

AN English evangelist went to hold services in Paris. He used to preach in English, and what he said was interpreted into French. There were two sisters in Paris; they lived the usual life of Parisian folly, spending every night at the theatre, concert, or ball-room. One morning one of them was lying utterly tired out on the sofa, when her sister came in and said, "Oh, there's something new; it's the greatest fun you ever heard!" "What is it? Anything for a little excitement," said the poor, tired worldling. "There's a man come over to Paris; he is preaching in English. It's the greatest fun out; everyone is going to hear him." "All right, we will go," said the other. So the carriage and pair were ordered, and she drove to the church. On arriving, she found the church crowded, and she was taken right to the front and put into a seat just facing the preacher as he stood up to preach. He fixed his eyes upon her, and as he looked down at her he said, "Poor sinner, God loves thee," and again, "Poor sinner, God loves thee." The lady understood English, and these words went home to her heart, for the power of God was present in that church. She bent her head and began to cry, and she said to herself, "What a fool I have been to come here!" and there and then the conviction of her selfishness and wickedness, and the emptiness and folly of the life she was leading, came to her heart. And so she cried, and these words led her that night to Christ.

DISGUSTING HINDU RITES.

A YOUNG missionary, in describing the city of Benares, "the Sacred City" of the Hindus, says: "I saw the poor bodies being burnt at the 'burning ghat,' and the ashes being scattered over the river. A few yards further down I saw people drinking this abominable black liquid; it was too disgusting. Then we landed and drove to several of the temples, where equally sad sights met our gaze. The people are grovelling in superstition. Hinduism, pure and simple, is an utterly rotten religion, so far as the masses are cancerned. The temples, one and all, are squalid, dirty holes. The Cow Temple is like a badly kept cow-house, and smells horribly. It was painful in the extreme to see men kissing the tails of cows and bowing before them, drinking the water in which fat old Brahmins have washed their feet, and presenting offerings of rice, yellow flowers, and coins at the different shrines. At one temple I noticed an attendant scraping together the flowers and rice into a heap, and carefully picking out and putting into a bowl the 'pice' and 'annas,' while an old priest kept an eye on him.

"As each worshipper left the temple, a dirty [illegible] mixture on his forehead—the mark of the [illegible] coin had to be forthcoming. These Brahmins are the most debased-looking men, much lower than the gentle-looking cows. At one temple, which was crammed — indeed, all were full of people—a huge bell was being rung. This temple is sacred to Juggernath, 'Lord of the World.' I was glad to get away from the disgusting sights."

A SCEPTIC TRANSLATOR CONVERTED.

WHEN the late Rev. Claudius Buchanan was traveling in India, he obtained from the Jews in the interior of that country, a very singular copy of the translation of the New Testament into Hebrew, made in the sixteenth century. The translator was a learned Rabbi, and his design was to make an accurate version of the New Testament, for the express purpose of confuting it, and of repelling the arguments of his neighbors, the Syrian Christians. But, behold the providence of God! The translator became a convert to Christianity; his own work subdued his unbelief; and he lived and died in the faith of Christ. This manuscript is now in the public library at Cambridge.

Imitation is the Sincerest Flattery.

Why is Pearline the mark for every soap powder, or so-called washing compound, which is brought out? Everything is called "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline.

None of them say "better"—they cannot. They should not say "as good as"—they are not. The simple fact that Pearline is so largely imitated would be enough to prove it the best. And when a poor washing compound can do so much damage, do you want anything but the best?

Conscious Immortality.*

WHEN man has gained some conception of the Divine Lord, his view of life is greatly enlarged. Already he may have perceived that he was a recipient, though not a passive life; but now he comes to know the motive of his Creator and Preserver. He finds him a being of surpassing love joined with wisdom, he comprehends that the power of God is the exercise of love, and he learns that the whole universe is an expression of love and wisdom, except so far as man may have marred it. But he also sees that he is himself the head of the creation; that it has been made to serve him; and that he is superior to it in his capacity to understand it and to make use of it. He distinguishes himself from all else, and gives names to all. He finds that a relation may exist and, for the promotion of his usefulness, ought to exist between him and his Lord; not the relation of the servant who knoweth not what the master doeth, but that of friend, as in the case of a father and son who are at one in spirit. He comes at length to perceive that this God of love could not have dwelt alone, contemplating his own perfections, but must in his very nature have sought for those whom he might bless, thus loving not himself so much as others out of himself. He finds, as all students of mind have found, that he cannot think of God except in his universe; that he cannot form an idea of him except in the field of his work, surrounded by his children, or preparing a place for them that they might dwell with him.

It is also perceived that man is a spirit. This is made plain from his capacity to grow in intellectual power while his body is from any cause declining, from his constant transcendence of space and time as he reads of the past or accompanies in imagination his friend upon a journey, and from his ability to come into relation with a Divine Spirit.

He comes to perceive that his highest aim is to co-operate in carrying out the sublime purposes of his God, and that his highest attainment will be to do so with increasing love and wisdom and power for ever. The perception of these aims, as representing the purpose of the infinite One in creating and preserving man, is the perception of the certainty of immortality.

'Tis the divinity that stirs within us.
'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter
And intimates eternity to man.

That this understanding was that of the best life of ancient time there can be no doubt, in view of the indisputable evidence of this fact in the sacred books of Egypt and Asia, and in the traditions of all nations. "There is, I know not how," said Cicero, "in the minds of men a presage, as it were, of a future existence;" and, in the first book of his "Tusculan Disputations," he treats of the "Contempt of Death" by showing that all men look beyond death. "It was the deep-seated belief of those of the Latin race whom Ennius describes as of the greatest antiquity, that there, is consciousness in death; that it is not a catastrophe that takes away and blots out everything, but is, so to speak, a migration and a change of life."

And Cicero made the right distinction between the mortal and immortal parts when he said, "It was not Hector that you dragged, Achilles, but the body that had been Hector's."

In his "Phædo," Plato treats of the soul's immortality, giving his authorities from Homer down. The Latin poet Ennius, a century before the Christ, wrote his own epitaph,—

Let no one grace my funeral with tears;
A living soul, I fly where floats my song.

It is, however, in the Christ that the perception of personal immortality is more distinct. In perfect calmness, as he was about to lay down his life, he spoke of the house of the Father and the place to be prepared for the disciples, using as always the language which they would best understand, and promising them that in due time they should be with him. In all that occurred with him the perception of immortality was conspicuous.

Extract from a Sermon by

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

"In this day God has mercifully allowed those of us who have a limited income to make provision for our families through the great life insurance companies all over the land. By some self-denial on our part, we can make this provision for those we shall leave behind us.

Is there anything so helpless as a woman, whose husband has just died, when, with her children at her back, she goes out to fight for bread? Shall she become a menial servant in some one else's household? No—not the one who has been lying on your arm all these years, and filling the household with joy and light.

How a man, with no surplus of estate, but still enough money to pay the premium on a life insurance policy, can refuse to do it, and then look his children in the face, and say his prayers at night on going to bed, expecting them to be answered, is a mystery I have never yet been able to fathom."

Of "the great life insurance companies" above referred to, the greatest (not only in this country, but in the world) is The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, which, in its existence of fifty years, has paid to those protected by its policies over $350,000,000 and now holds against future payments over $177,000,000 invested in the best securities.

The head office of this wonderful institution is in New York City.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts quickly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without the slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SPEEDILY RESULTS.

—Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which lasts away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Pears' Soap

How to have a fresh skin.---It grows from within and is worn off and washed off outside. A proper skin is neither too old or new; if too new it is red and tender; too old, it is worse, it is dead and corpse-like.

Active people easily have good skin, they have to wash; but people of leisure sometimes grow sallow because the skin is not washed enough.

What is wanted is a soap that does not affect the live skin underneath, but washes off the dead outside. Can't use too much or too often. That is Pears'.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

IN JERUSALEM STREETS.

Some of the Strange Sights the Traveler Sees in that Cosmopolitan City — A Kaleidoscope of Many Nationalities and Costumes.

MANY an ancient spot, rendered dear by tradition and sacred association, is disguised under a modern aspect. But though time brushes away the old landmarks and the once familiar scenes disappear, the halo cast by memory remains, and the locality lives in our hearts and thoughts as it was before the change. Every traveller who has visited modern Jerusalem will readily recognize in the photograph below one of the well-known thoroughfares of the Holy City—"the street of the Tower of David." It passes in front of the Mediterranean Hotel and leads from the Jaffa Gate to Mount Moriah. At almost all hours of the day, it presents a lively and intensely interesting panorama to the student of human nature, being unquestionably one of the most truly cosmopolitan thoroughfares in the world. On either side are shops occupied by small tradesmen. In the early morning hours, the street is a fruit market and is crowded. Later it is the scene of a motley and picturesque procession of nationalities in the greatest variety of color and costume. Military-looking Turks wearing the fez, strut past, side by side with grave Arabs in turbans and abbas; Jews wearing wide-brimmed hats, Armenians, white-turbaned peasants; Moors in bright burnous, or baggy, yellow breeches; Continental Europeans, Russian pilgrims and possibly an American or two. Many of the passers-by have the comfortable aspect of prosperous men of business. After a three minutes' walk from the Jaffa Gate the pedestrian reaches a spacious yard where country-women sell various kinds of produce, mostly fruits. At this point the Street of the Tower of David begins, and it ends at the barracks called Kashla, a distance of about an eighth of a mile. Here another path leads to the Armenian Convent and David's Gate on the slope of Mount Zion. On the right side of the street of David is a large ditch or hollow extending to the Jaffa Gate and the Tower, and which is used as a depository for refuse from the barracks of the Turkish troops, where sometimes between 4,000 and 5,000 troops are quartered. On the left in the photograph is the house of the American Consul, the residence of the Episcopal bishop, an English church, and in the background, the buildings of the Protestant Missions for Jews. North of the street of David is the way leading from the Jaffa Gate to the city. The Tower of David looms darkly on the right in the middle distance. It is now utilized as the quarters of a military guard.

THE STREET OF THE "TOWER OF DAVID" IN JERUSALEM.

From a photograph obtained in Palestine by Rev. Dr. Talmage.

There is a question as to the authenticity of the Tower of David, and the general belief is that the foundation alone is genuine, the superstructure being comparatively modern. The street of David is in the very heart of an eminently historic part of Jerusalem. "Christ Street" enters on the left and a few minutes' walk down that street brings the pedestrian to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the reputed tomb of the Saviour. This sacred edifice and its peculiar surroundings have already been described at length in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

There are several other churches in the vicinity of David's street, one (now occupied by Syrians) being pointed out as the site of the house at whose door Peter knocked after being miraculously released from prison, when he was greeted by the little maiden, Rhoda. Also near at hand are another church with sounding-boards instead of bells, a Lutheran church, which the German residents have constructed on the site of the ruined temple of the Knights of St. John, which the Sultan presented to Prussia in 1869—the descendant of Mohammed welcoming the descendants of the Crusaders!

Jerusalem is by no means a large city. Its population probably does not exceed 30,000 of which 14,000 are Moslems, 7,000 or 8,000 Christians and the remainder Jews. In Solomon's time, the city is said to have had a population of 500,000. The streets are for the most part narrow and anything but clean. At every turn one comes in sight of some great ruin, and where excavations have been made, the street level of the ancient city has been found thirty feet below the present surface. This will not appear so surprising when it is remembered that Jerusalem has suffered more from wars than any other city in the world, having been taken, either by siege or assault, seventeen times, and that on more than one occasion, its people have been slain, their houses demolished and the ground about them sowed with salt.

Some observant travellers have remarked it as a singular fact that the the Arabs think more of David than of Solomon. Among the many groups of tombs, few are so imposing as those that are said to be the final resting-places of David and his royal son, and none are so sedulously guarded. David's tomb, which is on an eminence that overlooks the lower or southern part of the city, is as well authenticated as most of the main objects in Jerusalem, and it was probably this site to which Peter referred when speaking of David he said: "his sepulchre is with us unto this day." This deep, local reverence for the memory of the great and good king will last while a single descendant of Abraham remains within the borders of Palestine.

THE THRESHING MACHINE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Isa. 28: 27, 28: "For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument neither is a cart wheel turned around upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised; because he will not ever be threshing it."

THERE are three kinds of seed mentioned: fitches, cummin, and corn. Of the last we all know. But it may be well to state that the fitches and the cummin were small seeds,like the carraway or the chick-pea. When these grains or herbs were to be threshed they were thrown on the floor, and the workmen would come around with staff, or rod, or flail, and beat them until the seed would be separated; but when the corn was to be threshed that was thrown on the floor, and the men would fasten horses or oxen to a cart with iron-dented wheels; that cart would be drawn around the threshing-floor,and so the work would be accomplished. Different kinds of threshing for different products. "The fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin;but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised, because he will not ever be threshing it."

The great thought that the text presses upon our souls is that we all go through some kind of threshing process. The fact that you may be devoting your life to honorable and noble purposes will not win you any escape. Wilberforce, the Christian emancipator, was in his day derisively called "Doctor Cantwell," Thomas Babington Macaulay, the advocate of all that was good long before he became the most conspicuous historian of his day, was caricatured in one of the quarterly reviews as "Babbletongue Macaulay." Norman McLeod,the great friend of the Scotch poor, was industriously maligned in all quarters, although on the day when he was carried out to his burial a workman stood and looked at the funeral procession, and said, "If he had done nothing for anybody more than he has done for me, he should shine as the stars forever and ever." All the small wits of London had their fling at John Wesley, the father of Methodism.

If such men could not escape the maligning of the world, neither can you expect to get rid of the sharp, keen stroke of the tribulum. All who will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. Besides that,there are the sicknesses,and the bankruptcies, and the irritations, and the disappointments which are ever putting a cup of aloes to your lip. Those wrinkles on your face are hieroglyphics, which, if deciphered, would make out a thrilling story of trouble. The footstep of the rabbit is seen the next morning on the snow, and on the white hairs of the aged are the footprints showing where swift trouble alighted.

Even amid the joys and hilarities of life, trouble will sometimes break in. As when the people were assembled in the Charlestown theatre, during the Revolutionary war, and while they were witnessing a farce, and the audience was in great gratulation, the guns of an advancing army were heard, and the audience broke up in wild panic and ran for their lives, so oftimes while you are seated amid the joys and festivities of this world you hear the cannonade of some great disaster. All the fitches, and the cummin, and the corn must come down on the threshing floor and be pounded.

My subject, in the first place, teaches us that it is no compliment to us if we escape great trial. The fitches and the cummin on the threshing floor might look over to the corn on another threshing floor and say: "Look at that poor, miserable, bruised corn. We have only been a little pounded, but that has been almost destroyed." Well, the corn, if it had lips, would answer and say: "Do you know the reason you have not been as much pounded as I have? It is because you are not of so much worth as I am; if you were you would be as severely run over." Yet there are men who suppose they are the Lord's favorites simply because their barns are full, and their bank account is flush, and there are are no funerals in the house. It may be because they are fitches and cummin; while down at the end of the lane the poor widow may be the Lord's corn. You are but little pounded because you are but little worth, and she bruised and ground because she is the best part of the harvest.

The heft of the threshing machine is according to the value of the grain. If you have not been much threshed in life, perhaps there is not much to thresh! If you have not been much shaken of trouble, perhaps it is because there is going to be a very small yield. When there are plenty of blackberries the gatherers go out with large baskets; but when the drought has almost consumed the fruit, then a quart measure will do as well. It took the venomous snake on Paul's hand and the pounding of him with stones until he was taken up for dead, and the jamming against him of prison gates,and the Ephesian vociferation, and the skinned ankles of the painful stocks, and the foundering of the Alexandrian corn-ship, and the beheading stroke of the Roman sheriff to bring Paul to his proper development.

It was not because Robert Moffat, and Lady Rachel Russell,and Frederick Oberlin were worse than other people that they had to suffer, it was because they were better, and God wanted to make them best. By the carefulness of the threshing you may always conclude the value of the grain.

Next, my text teaches us that God proportions our trials to what we can bear. The staff for the fitches. The rod for the cummin. The iron wheel for the corn. Sometimes people in great trouble say: "Oh, I can't bear it!" But you did bear it. God would not have sent it upon you if he did not know that you could bear it. You trembled and you swooned; but you got through. God will not take from your eyes one tear too many, nor from your lungs one sigh too deep, nor from your temples one throb too sharp. The perplexities of your earthly business have not in them one tangle too intricate.

You sometimes feel as if our world were full of bludgeons flying haphazard. Oh, no; they are threshing instruments that God just suits to your case. There is not a dollar of bad debts on your ledger, or a disappointment about goods that you expected to go up but that have gone down, or a swindle of your business partner, or a trick on the part of those who are in the same kind of business that you are, but God intended to overrule for your immortal help. "Oh," you say, "there is no need talking that way to me—I don't like to be cheated and outraged." Neither does the corn like the corn-thresher; but after it has been threshed and winnowed it has a great deal better opinion of winnowing-mills and corn-threshers.

"Well," you say, "If I could choose my troubles I would be willing to be troubled." Ah, my brother, then it would not be trouble. You would choose something that would not hurt, and unless it hurts it does not get sanctified. Your trial, perhaps, may be childlessness. You are fond of children. You say: "Why does God send children to that other household where they are unwelcome, and are beaten and banged about, when I would have taken them in the arms of my affections?" You say: "Any other trial but this." You trial perhaps may be a disfigured countenance, or a face that is easily caricatured, and you say: "Oh, I could endure anything if only I was good-looking." And your trial, perhaps, is a violent temper, and you have to drive it like six unbroken horses amid the gunpowder explosions of a great holiday, and ever and anon it runs away with you. Your trial is the asthma. You say: "Oh, if it were rheumatism, or neuralgia, or erysipelas, but it is this asthma, and it is such an exhausting thing to breathe." Your trouble is a husband, short, sharp, snappy, and cross about the house, and raising a small riot because a button is off! How could you know the button is off? Your trial is a wife ever in contest with the servants, and she is a sloven. Though she was very careful about her appearance in your presence once, now she is careless because she said her fortune is made! Your trial is a hard school-lesson you cannot learn, and you have bitten your finger-nails until they are a sight to behold. Everybody has some vexation or annoyance, or trial, and he or she thinks it is the one least adapted. "Anything but this," all say. "Anything but this."

Oh, my hearer, are you not ashamed to be complaining all this time against God? Who manages the affairs of this world, anyhow? Is it an infinite Modoc? or a Sitting Bull savage? or an omnipotent Nana Sahib? No; it is the most merciful and glorious and wise Being in all the universe. You cannot teach Omnipotence anything. You have fretted and worried almost enough. Do you not think so? Some of you are making yourselves ridiculous in the sight of the angels. Here is a naval architect, and he draws out the plan of a ship of many thousand tons. Many workmen are engaged on it for a long while. The ship is done; and some day, with the flags up and the air gorgeous with bunting, that vessel is launched for Southampton. At that time, a lad six years of age comes running down the dock with a toy-boat which he has made with his own jack-knife; and he says: "Here, my boat is better than yours. Just look at this jib-boom and these weather cross jack-braces;" and he drops his little boat beside the great ship, and there is a roar of laughter on the docks. Ah, my friends, that great ship is your life as God planned it—vast, million-tonned, ocean-destined, eternity-bound. That little boat is your life as you are trying to hew it out, and fashion it, and launch it. Ah, do not try to be a rival of the great Jehovah. God is always right, and in nine cases out of ten you are wrong. He sends just the hardships,just the bankruptcies, just the cross that it is best for you to have. He knows what kind of grain you are, and he sends the right kind of threshing-machine. It will be a rod, or staff, or iron wheel, just according as you are fitches, or cummin, or corn.

Again: My subject teaches us that God keeps trial on us until we let go. The farmer shouts "whoa!" to his horses as soon as the grain has dropped from the stalk. The farmer comes with his fork and tosses up the straw,and he sees that the straw has let go the grain, and the grain is thoroughly threshed. So God. Smiting rod and turning wheel, both cease as soon as we let go. We hold on to this world with its pleasures, and riches, and emoluments, and our knuckles are so firmly set that it seems as if we could hold on forever. God comes along with some threshing trouble and beats us loose. We started under the delusion that this was a great world. We learned out of our geography that it was so many thousand miles in diameter, and so many thousand miles in circumference, and we said: "O my, what a world!" Troubles came in after-life, and this trouble sliced off one part of the world, and that trouble sliced off another part of the world, and it has got to be a smaller world, and, in some of your estimations a very insignificant world; and it is depreciating all the time as a spiritual property. Ten per cent. off, fifty per cent. off, and there are those here who would not give ten cents for this world—for the entire world—as a soul-possession.

We thought that friendship was a grand thing. In school we used to write compositions about friendship; and perhaps we made our graduating speech on commencement day on friendship. Oh! it was a charmed thing; but does it mean as much to you as it used to? You have gone on in life, and one friend has betrayed you, and another friend has misinterpreted you, and another friend has neglected you, and friendship comes now sometimes to mean to you merely another axe to grind!

So with money. We thought if a man had a competency he was safe for all the future; but we have learned that a mortgage may be defeated by an unknown previous incumbrance; that signing your name on the back of a note may be your business death-warrant; that a new tariff may change the current of trade; that a man may be rich to-day and poor to-morrow. And God, by all these misfortunes, is trying to loosen our grip; but still we hold on. God smites us with a staff; but we hold on. And he strikes us with a rod; but we hold on. And he sends over us the iron wheel of misfortune; but we hold on.

There are men who keep their grip on this world until the last moment, who suggest to me the condition and conduct of the poor Indian in the boat in the Niagara rapids, coming on toward the fall. Seeing that he could not escape, a moment or two before he got to the verge of the plunge, he lifted a wine-bottle and drank it off, and then tossed the bottle into the air. So there are men who clutch the world, and they go down through the rapids of temptation and sin, and they hold on to the very last moment of life, drinking to their eternal damnation as they go over and go down.

Oh, let go! Let go! The best fortunes are in heaven. There are no absconding cashiers from that bank, no failing in promises to pay. Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. Let go! Depend upon it that God will keep upon you the staff or the rod or the iron wheel until you do let go.

Another thing my text teaches us is, that Christian sorrow is going to have a sure terminus. My text says: "Bread corn is bruised, because he will not be ever threshing it." Blessed be God for that! Pound away, O flail. Turn on, O wheel! Your work will soon be done. "He will not be ever threshing it." Now the Christian has almost as much use in the organ for the stop tremulant as he has for the trumpet. But after awhile he will put the last dirge into the portfolio forever. So much of us as is wheat will be separated from so much as is chaff, and there will be no more need of pounding.

They never cry in heaven, because they have nothing to cry about. There are no tears of bereavement, for you shall have your friends all round about you. There are no tears of poverty, because each one sits at the king's table, and has his own chariot of salvation, and free access to the wardrobe where princes get their array. No tears of sickness, for there are no pneumonias on the air, and no malarial exhalations from the rolling river of life, and no crutch for the lame limb, and no splint for the broken arm; but the pulses throbbing with the health of the eternal God, in a climate like our June before the blossoms fall, or our gorgeous October before the leaves scatter.

In that land the souls will talk over the different modes of threshing. Oh! the story of the staff that struck the fitches, and the rod that beat the cummin, and the iron wheel that went over the corn. Daniel will describe the lions, and Jonah leviathan, and Paul the elmwood whips with which he was scourged, and Eve will tell how aromatic Eden was the day she left it, and John Rogers will tell of the smart of the flame, and Elijah of the fiery team that wheeled him up the sky-steeps, and Christ of the numbness and paroxysm and hemorrhages of the awful crucifixion. There they are before the throne of God. On one elevation all those who were struck of the staff. On a higher elevation all those who were struck of the rod. On a highest elevation, and amid the highest altitudes of heaven, all those who were under the wheel. He will not ever be threshing it.

Oh! my hearers, is there not enough salve in this text to make a plaster large enough to heal all your wounds? When a child is hurt, the mother is very apt to say to it: "Now, it will soon feel better." And that is what God says when he unbosoms all the trouble in the hush of this great promise: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." You may leave your pocket handkerchief sopping wet with tears on your death pillow, but you will go up absolutely sorrowless. They will wear black; you will wear white. Cypresses for them; palms for you.

You will say: "Is it possible that I am here? Is this heaven? Am I so pure now I will never do anything wrong? Am I so well that I will never again be sick? Are these companionships so firm that they will never again be broken? Is that Mary? Is that John? Is that my loved one I put away into darkness? Can it be that these are the faces of those who lay so wan and emaciated in the back room on that awful night dying? Oh, how radiant they are! Look at them! How radiant they are!

"Why, how unlike this place is from what I thought when I left the world below. Ministers drew pictures of this land, but how tame compared with the reality! They told me on earth that death was sunset. No, no! It is sunrise! Glorious sunrise! I see the light now purpling the hills, and the clouds flame with the coming day."

Then the gates of heaven will be opened, and the entranced soul, with the acuteness and power of the celestial vision, will look ten thousands of miles down upon the bannered procession—a river of shimmering splendor—and will cry out: "Who are they?" And the angel of God standing close by, will say: "Don't you know who they are?" "No," says the entranced soul, "I cannot guess who they are." The angel will say: "I will tell you, then, who they are. These are they who came out of great tribulation, or threshing, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

Oh! that I could administer some of these drops of celestial anodyne to those nervous and excited souls. If you would take enough of it it would cure all your pangs. The thought that you are going to get through with this after a while, all this sorrow and all this trouble. We shall have a great many grand days in heaven, but I will tell you which will be the grandest day of all the million ages of heaven. You say: "Are you sure you can tell me?" Yes, I can. It will be the day we get there. Some say heaven is growing more glorious. I suppose it is; but I do not care much about that. Heaven now is good enough for me.

History has no more gratulatory scene than the breaking in of the English army upon Lucknow, India. A few weeks before a massacre had occurred at Cawnpore, and two hundred and sixty women and children had been put in a room. Then five professional butchers went in and slew them. Then the bodies of the slain were taken out and thrown into a well. As the English army came into Cawnpore they went into the room; and oh, what a horrid scene! Sword-strokes on the wall near the floor, showing that the poor things had crouched when they died; and they saw also that the floor was ankle-deep in blood. The soldiers walked on their heels across it, lest their shoes be submerged of the carnage. And on that floor of blood there were flowing locks of hair and fragments of dresses.

ANCIENT MANNER OF THRESHING.

Out in Lucknow they had heard of the massacre, and the women were waiting for the same awful death; waiting amid anguish untold; waiting in pain and starvation, but waiting heroically—when, one day, Havelock and Outram and Norman and Sir David Baird and Peel, the heroes of the English army—huzza for them!—broke in on that horrid scene, and while yet the guns were sounding, and while cheers were issuing from the starving, dying people on the one side, and from the travel-worn and powder-blackened soldiers on the other—right there, in front of the King's palace, there was such a scene of handshaking, and embracing, and boisterous joy as would utterly confound the pen of the poet and the pencil of the painter. And no wonder, when these emaciated women, who had suffered so heroically for Christ's sake, marched out from their incarcerations, one wounded English soldier got up in his fatigue and wounds, and leaned against the wall, and threw his cap up and shouted, "Three cheers, my boys, for the brave women!"

Oh! that was an exciting scene. But a gladder and more triumphant scene will it be when you come up into heaven from the conflicts and incarcerations of this world, streaming with the wounds of battle, and wan with hunger; and while the hosts of God are cheering their great hosanna, you will strike hands of congratulation and eternal deliverance in the presence of the throne. On that night there will be bonfires on every hill of heaven, and there will be illumination in every palace, and there will be a candle in every window—ah, no; I forget, I forget; they will have no need of the candle or of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever. Hail! hail! sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty.

MISSIONARIES KILLED IN AFRICA.

MR. JOHN ELLERY, a missionary at Ikau Station, Africa, writes: "This morning, Jan. 16th, a cry was raised that Mr. Thermol and Mr. Peters of the Congo Free State were killed by the Mongo natives. We hear so much, that we are not apt to believe all we hear at once. But to our horror the news was in this case true. Mr. Peters was speared; his head was cut off and carried away as a trophy. Mr. Thermol was simply stabbed with a spear, and left to die, weltering in his own blood. When the news came, it was of course full of terror. The cry was that we should be dealt with in the same way, and a general wail arose at the station. When I ascertained that statements as to the death of the two officers of Basankusa were true, I thought it my duty to see that they were properly buried. Miss Judd and Miss Whelpdale volunteered to go with me in the canoe, leaving the station in the charge of our workmen, who by the way were armed with guns, owing to threats of the Mongos.

"We got into the boat, pushed off from the bank, and reached the island in front of our ground. All Ikau was out on the landing place. Shouts rang on every hand. What with the noise of our men in the boat, and the excitement and cries of the people, there was a proper din! I hardly knew what to do. You may write of heroines, I certainly had two with me. Not a wave of fear passed over them, yet my heart almost bled for them. We got in the shade of the island. One man, Jina, came over. I noticed that he had a fine knife and a flint gun. We learned next day that his intention was to kill us all three. Ise Njundu, a bad old chief, was very anxious to have all the white men killed. However, we got to Basa N'Kusa safely, and found there a canoe going down river, with State soldiers on board.

"One of these stepped into our canoe to be with our sisters while I went on shore. 'Who will protect us?' they asked me. 'He,' I said, pointing to the soldier; 'but, better still, God.' I hurried on shore, asked for soldiers, and after giving special instructions how to make the coffins, I hastened back to find my charge happy in him who is mighty to save. When we got back to the station, I found that about twenty of the Mongos had made a raid on our goats. Our men fired loudly, and the Mongos stayed their hands. At six o'clock five soldiers (only native men) came to protect us. Being wearied out we committed ourselves to our Father and were soon asleep."

THE MUSCATINE OUTRAGES.

The Houses of Three Prominent Citizens Blown up at Midnight to Punish them for Closing up the Saloons.

A REPORT of an outrage almost incredible in its atrocity comes from Muscatine, Iowa. It is an indication of the length to which the men interested in the liquor traffic will go, when the "craft by which they have their wealth is in danger." Special telegrams to the Voice state that some weeks ago, three citizens of Muscatine petitioned the courts for an injunction to close up the saloons that were running in that city in defiance of the law. In doing so they were fulfiling a public duty which ought not to have been necessary. It is for the executive officers to see that the laws are obeyed, but when from any cause they fail to perform their duty, public-spirited citizens are bound by conscience to remedy the defect, or the community is open to the reproach of being a lawless one. The three citizens in question, John Mahin, E. M. Kessinger and N. Rosenberger were aware that the duty was a dangerous one but they had the courage to do it and their petition was granted.

The wrongdoers had no resource but to obey as the law was against them. What followed ought to stir the indignation of every American citizen. In the dead of night while these men with their wives and families were wrapt in slumber their houses were blown up with gunpowder. So complete was the wreck that it is little short of a miracle that any of the inmates escaped. In Mr. Mahin's home there were beside himself and his wife, their two daughters, his thirteen-year-old son and a servant. They were awakened by the awful noise and shock. Falling ceilings and overturned furniture told them that some terrible catastrophe had occurred. Yawning holes through the floorings from the basement to the roof showed the force of the explosion. The family escaped in their night-clothes to the friendly shelter of a neighbor's house. In Mr. Rosenberger's family were two little babies, and his pretty home was completely wrecked and the occupants thrown into the ceilar. There were two young ladies at Mr. Kessinger's besides their families. That all should have escaped serious, if not fatal injury, is due to God's Providential care.

There can be no reasonable doubt as to the cause of the outrages. The theory of accidental explosion is untenable, from the fact that the houses blown up were a mile apart, and the explosions were almost simultaneous. There is no explanation possible, but the one that an enemy, full of malice, wrought the havoc. That these three men had recently set the law in motion to restrain evildoers, furnishes all the clue to the perpetrators that is necessary. It should be easy now to collect the evidence to bring them to justice. We are glad to learn that an indignation meeting has been held, and a reward offered for the conviction of the offenders. If a citizen, who performs a public duty in our free Republic, is to be liable to outrage for doing so, it is time we ceased our boasting of the rights and privileges which belong to us under the Constitution.

A BURNING TRACT CONVERTED HIM.

SOME time ago a gentleman as he passed along the street was offered a tract. He somewhat brusquely refused, saying he did not want to be bothered with any of their evangelistic nonsense; but as the officer pressed him to take, he did so, though he assured him he would burn it as soon as he got home; and he kept his word, throwing it into the fire and watching it burn. As the thin paper curled up with the heat, his eye caught the sentence, "The Word of the Lord liveth for ever," and do what he could, he could not rid himself of the words. They buzzed in his ear, they stood out boldly on the white pages of the ledger. Wherever he was, that passage of Scripture haunted him and made him miserable, until unable to bear it longer, he went to a mission hall, and there finding peace, pardon and salvation, he learned to rejoice that the Word of the Lord did live for ever. A little importunity is sometimes a good thing; if that open-air worker had not pressed the tract on that gentleman, then, humanly speaking, that immortal soul would not have been saved.

DIVINE GUIDANCE.

S. S. Lesson for June 25. GoldenText, Pro. 3:6
By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

OH, if I only could be quite sure of the will of God!" said a Christian worker one day, to an older and more advanced Christian. "Are you quite sure God wants you to know his will?" replied the man of God. "Of course, I could not doubt that." "And if God wants you to know his will, and you are willing to do it at any cost, can you doubt that he will find means to make it clear to you?" God used these words to bring light and rest of spirit into the heart of the troubled inquirer. The real diffiulty lay in his want of confidence in God. As soon as confidence was reestablished, the enemy lost his foothold, and perplexity, which had involved questions in an almost endless maze within his mind, gave way to quiet listening to God, in the absolute certainty that he had taken the responsibility. Jesus was now walking on the water, and he said: "Peace be still." "The Lord shall not as an exception. Many of God's children are most anxious to be guided at certain times, and under certain circumstances, in which their own experience of the past, or knowledge about the future does not suffice to bring them to a satisfactory decision. Even Benhaded the idolatrous king of Syria, and enemy of Israel, wanted to know the mind of God about his sickness (II. Kings 8: 7, 8), but there is no indication that he was prepared to yield himself up to the guidance of God. He wanted God to serve him, but he was not prepared to serve God. Many a one disbelieves in the distinct guidance which God gives to his listening, obedient children, just because he has sought guidance when it suited himself, without giving up the reins of his entire life into the hands of God. "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." We cannot make God our servant. If he guides us, it must be upon his own terms, and consistently with his position as our Creator, our King, our Father; One so infinitely superior to us, that it is in purest grace alone he guides us. We cannot command his direction as we would that of a mountain guide, whom we hire to suit our purpose. When it is to acknowledge God in all our words and deeds, to refer to him at all times, and do all under his own eye, it is consistent to expect his clear and constant direction. But the natural pride of the heart does not easily yield to the reins of empire. Most men have a strong belief in themselves, they have not learned the lesson which Jeremiah the prophet both learned and taught: "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. Far from acknowledging their inability to direct their own steps, they seek also to direct those of other people. Yet it is only God who knows the end from the beginning. He sees what is in future. He knows what the issues are of every step, of every action. "He knoweth what is in the darkness and the light dwelleth with him." (Dan. 2: 22.) How do we know what will be the result of such and such a move which we may make? David, the man after God's own heart, trusted himself so little, that he always inquired of the Lord about his plans and purposes. It was his joy to testify: "He leadeth me beside the still waters . . . He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. (Ps. 23: 2, 3.) And this habitual guidance of his God was such a real rest to him that he could say: "Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." David could trust his Shepherd, he knew that such a Guide was to be relied on, and that he would never abandon his sheep in any dark valley. From the time of his conversion, when he knew the blessedness of sin forgiven, he had proved the faithfulness of his God to his promise: "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eyes." (Ps. 32: 8.) Perhaps it was a page in his own experience which made him add as a warning from God to others: "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding, whose mouths must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee." This brings us to

of Divine guidance: "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." This science of understanding God has to be learned like any other, by practice: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." God never makes known his will as a theory to be discussed, and thus profane, irreverent minds cannot learn its language, or understand it. He makes known his will to those who yield up their will. "I beseech you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy acceptable to God which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." In the true spirit of sacrifice, with our will laid down, and all voices in our own hearts stilled, we are able to hear the voice, and understand the will of our God. And this, not like a servant or a child, who receives a direction, and goes in blind obedience to obey it; the true understanding of what the will of the Lord is proceeds from a joint heirship with him in his designs and purposes which leads to confidence in him whatever happens. He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel." Moses knew the secret of the Lord, he understood his God, he knew him better than he knew anyone upon earth and therefore when he obeyed his direction, however unsuccessful it might seem to him, he was unmoved, he knew his God could not be at fault. God's leadings are often unexpected. When with the children of Israel he "journeyed from the wilderness of Sin . . . according to the commandment of the Lord, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink, Moses did not therefore think the Lord had misguided him. He knew his God too well to doubt him, and he simply sought direction fom the God who had taken the responsibility of his people's journeys: "What shall I do unto this people?" was his question, and he was staggered when his God commanded him to smite the dry and burning rock in the desert to procure water. He might not have known beforehand that God's way of deliverance would be to bring water from the rock, but he knew, from much previous experience of his God, that he was going to work some glorious deliverance which would be worthy of him, and would bring relief to his people.

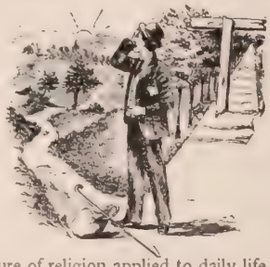
The apostle Paul, when he was guided by a vision to go over into Macedonia and when, after preaching with blessing in Philippi he was thrown into prison, and his feet made fast in the stocks—never doubted that he was rightly led to go to that city. Instead of groaning and mourning in the prison, that he had mistaken the will of his God, or things would never have turned out as they had done, he prayed and sang praises to God as he could not have done if he had doubted the will of his Lord. And he did not find his confidence misplaced; the earthquake, the deliverance from prison, the conversion of the jailer and his family, were proof to him that he was in the will of God. An understanding of God's will causes quiet of spirit in the midst of the most distressing and heartrending circumstances. Knowing that there is a fiery trial which is to try us, those who understand their God do not count it "a strange thing" (I. Pet. 4: 12); they can rejoice inasmuch as they are partakers of Christ's sufferings that when his glory shall be revealed, i. e. when he comes again they may be glad also with exceeding joy.

There was a wonderful rest about the life of our Lord upon earth. Knowing as none other can know, the condition of the souls around him, he did not feel the carpenter's shop, and the daily labor, a galling yoke to a spirit which longed to save souls; and yet, so deep was his love to sinners, that when the moment of his Father's will was come he could willingly bear on him the iniquity of us all, and be made sin, made a curse for us. He trusted his Father's will so completely that he rested in it, and therefore was never in a hurry and would do nothing until his hour was come, the hour in which his Father had guided him to do this or that.

God's guidance is always in accordance with, and most often through his own word. The mistaken idea that God gives revelations independently of Scripture is most dangerous, and may lead into fearful error. It is just as the Word of God dwells in and possesses us, that we learn to recognize his guidance in all things, and this brings the quiet of eternity into our earthly life.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.



THE lessons which are to form the subject of review this week relate chiefly to practical duties rather than to doctrines. They present a picture of religion applied to daily life. The three from the book of Job, show us our duty in affliction. They represent the good man bowed down under a series of disasters, yet patient though bewildered; confident in the righteousness of God, though ignorant of his purposes in afflicting him; and finally triumphant in his vindication. Three lessons from the book of Proverbs showed how true wisdom is to be sought and valued. A fourth, from the same book, was directed against intemperance, which seems to have been an evil as clearly recognized eight and twenty centuries ago as it is now; and a fifth, also from Proverbs, depicted the ideal woman, a being whose excellences, if unfashionable, are as desirable in our day as in that of the author. Two lessons were from Ecclesiastes, and showed in what the chief good of life consists and that its prizes consisted in character and disposition rather than in wealth or learning. Finally there was the lesson of last week, inculcating honesty toward God and man and the cultivation of the qualities which fit men to be citizens in the kingdom of Christ. It will be well to devote the time at the teachers' disposal to a presentation of all these points, lest the idea, which is now far too common, be perpetuated, that religion consists in forms and ceremonies, in church and school attendance and has no connection with daily life in the world.

When he hath tried me. (Job 23: 10.) A ring came into a lady's possession the value of which she knew nothing of. It was exquisite in workmanship and very beautiful in design. She took it to a jeweller who said that the only way of being sure about it being genuine was to put it in acid. "If it is genuine," he said, "it will suffer no injury; but if it is an imitation the acid will corrode and destoy it." The lady looked tenderly at her ring. It was so beautiful that it seemed a pity to run the risk, but if it was genuine there would be no harm and she would value it so much more after it had borne the test. "Put it in," she said almost breathlessly. The jeweller dropped the ring into the acid while its owner looked on anxiously. In a few minutes she received back her treasure, looking brighter and clearer for the ordeal and perfectly sound. Job may have been as good a man before he was tested by his troubles as he was afterward, but the test proved that he was genuine and true. He was not serving God for what he got by it, as Satan had insinuated.

In all thy ways acknowledge him. (Prov. 3: 6.) Sometimes after being delivered out of trouble we forget to acknowledge God as our deliverer, having lost sight of him in the instrument he employed. We thank the man who was the instrument but omit to thank God who used him to answer our prayers. The story is told that a poor old woman who had exhausted her small supply of food and did not know where the next was to come from, laid her case before God and was overheard by some idle, scoffing, young men who were lounging at her window. Wishing to have some fun, they bought a loaf, wrapped it well up in paper, contrived to drop it down the chimney and then peeped in to see if she was startled. They heard her say, "Thank God." The blasphemous young men called down the chimney, "It wasn't God who sent it. It was the devil." The old woman promptly answered, "The devil may have brought it, but I know the Lord sent it." The young men felt rebuked, and realized that God had used them to supply the old woman's need.

He shall direct thy paths. (Prov 3: 6). Rev. Thomas Kelly writes: "I remember the first time I came down the St. Lawrence; as the Long Sault Rapids hove in sight, all the passengers were intently looking at the rushing, foaming waters in the distance. Soon the boat was stopped and a man taken on board. He was an Indian, a man about fifty-five, stalwart and strong. I watched him with peculiar interest, as he put his hands upon the wheel and pointed the boat toward the rapids. With hands busily plying the wheel at times, and his eyes riveted, as it were, upon some object ahead, he held that great vessel steady to its course; and as we were flying with frightful rapidity, I beheld, little more than an arm's length from the vessel huge rocks protruding from the water. The variation of only two or three feet in the vessel's course would have caused her to be shattered to pieces. But he guided us safely through." So God guides the path of those who acknowledge him in all their ways.

There come times in life when the Christian dare not take the responsibility of directing his own path and he learns then lessons which suggest to him the benefits of always looking up for guidance. Dr. Guthrie said: "I have known a timid traveler whose route lay across the higher Alps, along a path no broader than a mule's foothold, that skirted a dreadful precipice, whence could be discerned the river far down below, diminished to a silver thread—I have known that traveler when crossing that pass deliberately drop the reins on the mule's neck and close her eyes, leaving the mule without guidance. She knew that a touch on the bridle might be a movement precipitating rider and steed into the chasm to be dashed to pieces on the jagged rocks below. She believed that they would be safer if she made no attempt to guide and she just closed her eyes and was carried safely over."

God is in heaven and thou upon earth. (Eccles. 5: 2.) The Rev. J. Gilmour, the devoted missionary among the Mongols, gives the following translation of a Mongolian parable: "A blind tortoise lived in a well. Another tortoise, a native of the ocean, in its inland travels happened to fall into the well. The blind one asks of his new comrade whence he came. "From the sea." Hearing of the sea the blind tortoise wanted to know what that was like. "It is large and vast," is the reply. "Is it as large as this?" is the blind one's next question, and he swims around a circle. "Larger," replied he of the sea. The blind tortoise swims around two thirds of the well and asks, "Is it as large as that?" The sea tortoise answers, "Larger, much larger." The blind tortoise listens wonderingly. "Can it," he asks, "be as large as the whole well?" "Larger, much larger," is again the reply. "If the sea is larger than the well how large must it be?" the blind tortoise asks in bewilderment. The sea-tortoise answers, "You have never known any other water than that of your well, and how can you comprehend the sea? If you were in the sea you might go on for many, many years and explore only a small part of it." "It cannot be," replies the blind one, "it is opposed to all my knowledge and experience—it is contrary to reason. I do not believe there is any such place. You are simply praising your native place in exaggerated phrases."

Pay that which thou hast vowed. (Eccles. 5: 4.) There is a legend of a rich merchant, that in a great storm at sea, he vowed to Jupiter that if he came safe to land with his vessel he would give a sacrifice of a hecatomb—a hundred oxen. The storm ceaseth and anon he remembereth his vow and bethinketh himself that a hecatomb was a large offering. The storm is over, peradventure seven oxen will satisfy the god. Another tempest coming upon him he renews his pledge of seven oxen. But being again delivered, he thinketh that one ox is a great sacrifice and will be sufficient to express his gratitude. On further meditation, the less costly offering of a sheep commends itself to him. It is a sacrifice and it will do—a sheep is enough. But at last, being set ashore, he thought a sheep was too much and purposed to carry to the altar only a few dates. On the way he eats up the dates and has only the stones to lay on the altar.

toral work give promise of a future of the highest usefulness in the Gospel field, there are some who by reason of special circumstances connected with their sacred calling, come into public prominence. To this class belongs the Rev. Chandler Alban Oakes, the stalwart young assistant-pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle and right-hand man of Rev. Dr. Talmage in all that relates to the spiritual and material conduct of the greatest Protestant Church in the United States.

Mr. Oakes was born June 10, 1865, in Delaware, Pa., near the city of Chester. When he was six years old, his father moved to the State of Delaware, near Wilmington, and there young Chandler was brought up on a farm until his fourteenth year, when he went to Wilmington to prepare for college, as he intended to study law. Like many other young men, he became anxious to make money, and leaving school, he entered a cotton-mill office. He quickly mastered the details of the business. During his stay there, he became a church member and was active in all Sunday School and general church work. He organized two Sunday Schools in the city of Wilmington. In the fall of 1885, he entered the Academy of Bucknell University to prepare for college and proved so apt a student that he took the three years' course in two years. In 1887, he entered Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., pursuing the classical course.

The last two years of his college life, he preached each Sunday at Pen Argyl, Pa., beginning with thirty members in a little church. His membership growing, he erected a larger building, capable of seating 400 people. When he resigned in the fall of 1891, the church had 140 members and the services were well attended. In September of that year he entered Union Theological Seminary in New York, and had been there but one month, when a committee from East Stroudsburg, Pa., urged him to take charge of their little church. He did so, going out every Saturday night to preach. Soon the place was uncomfortably filled and he began a movement for a new church, and in August 1892, he dedicated an edifice that cost $12,000 and which was wholly free of debt. During the spring of 1892, he organized a successful movement for raising $50,000 for the last State Normal School to be erected in Pennsylvania. He drew the plans personally and had charge of the men during its entire construction.

These minor details afford glimpses of a strong, self-reliant, Christian character, which, within a recent date, has demonstrated its value in practical church work. Nearly six months ago, Mr. Oakes accepted an offer of the position of Assistant-Pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, Rev. Dr. Talmage having been already impressed, on a short acquaintance, by the marked ability and energy of the young preacher. To Mr. Oakes, in addition to his other duties, was entrusted the sole responsibility for arranging to raise the money to pay off the floating debt on the Tabernacle. It was largely due to his indefatigable efforts that the recent settlement of the debt was effected and the Tabernacle saved. At first, the debt seemed to be an insurmountable obstacle, and although many different efforts had been made to extinguish it, it seemed to increase rather than diminish, until Mr. Oakes undertook the onerous duty of dealing with the problem. By personal solicitation, and through various channels, he raised a considerable sum. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, anxious to avert the danger, and to preserve the Tabernacle to Christian America, came to his relief, and through the generosity of its subscribers, raised an Emergency Fund, which, together with the moneys collected by Mr. Oakes, and Dr. Talmage's personal contribution of $10,000, sufficed to meet the demand of the creditors and to liquidate the entire Floating Debt.

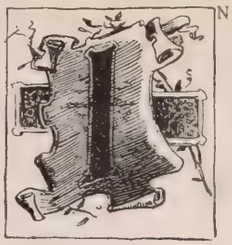
Mr. Oakes is a strong, clear, vigorous Gospel preacher, and has a bright future before him, in whatsoever part of the Master's vineyard he may be called to labor.

THE FATE OF A DRUNKARD.

REV. G. C. GRUBB, a missionary, after riding to a C. M. S. station in Ceylon, related the following incident: "We passed a village where an English sailor, a few weeks ago, fell down drunk at the side of the road. Early the next morning a cobra went over him, which he seized round the neck. The beast wound round his arm till all strength left him; then the venomous creature struck him one fatal blow in the face, and in less than half an hour he was dead. When will people wake up and work in the cause of total abstinence? One planter, who was converted during this mission, and who knew the snare drink is to many, asked the Lord to teach him what to do with the whisky he had in his bungalow. That night he kept waking up uncomfortable about it, and had no peace or sleep till he had emptied every drop down the gutter. One man said, 'What waste! It might have been given to some old people, and done them good.' This was done in one case, where a whole family became abstainers, and did not like to waste their stock, so sent it all to a relative, an old woman of sixty. This woman finished the lot in two weeks, and is now dying of drink, the victim of her thoughtless friends."

An African Colony in Wales.

How a Singular Experiment in Missionary Training has Progressed.



IN past years, so many white missionaries have died at their posts in Africa that it has been decided in one part of the world at least to try the experiment of bringing to a temperate climate a number of African converts to be trained and educated for missionary service in their native land. The initial experiment of this character is now in progress at the town of Colwyn Bay, North Wales. There a Training College has been established and a number of students are being prepared for duty in the tropical field, where the white missionary cannot live. In addition to the consideration of health and life-saving, it is believed that there will be a great economy of expenditure in educating and preparing African students in this way. The expenses attending sickness, for medicines and extra nourishment, and the necessary attendant losses of time, labor, health, and salaries, will be avoided. It costs on an average about $2,500 a year to keep a white missionary in Africa. It has only cost so far, $125 per annum to teach a student in the Colwyn Bay Colony. Last year it cost only $1,250 to keep ten students there—including rent, taxes, maintenance, printing, and traveling expenses. Last year it cost one missionary society in London alone nearly $75,000 to support twenty-seven white missionaries on the Congo. It costs the negro little or nothing to live in his native country, nature being bountiful in supplying food.

In Colwyn Bay the students are cut off from savagery, slavery, and fetichism. They are taught that in future they must use their brains, limbs and physical capabilities for the benefit of their fellow creatures, as well as their minds and hearts for the glory of God. The students have had preliminary education on the Congo, and are the picked of the converts. After having received four or five years' training under the elevating influences of the college and its surroundings, these young men, it may reasonably be supposed, will see the advantages of civilized life and be thoroughly disgusted with the heathen practices and vices of their early days, and return to Africa to dispense among their fellow countrymen the beneficial influences of civilization, spiritually and temporally. They return as assistants at first, under white missionaries.

In the Training College at Colwyn Bay the students are treated with every kindness. They are not permitted to go about much to avoid being spoilt by over-petting; and being kept in discipline for the few years they are in the institute, it helps to mould their character into sober-minded, thinking men, as well as making them good students and observers—qualities that will help their future work.

The late Mr. A. M. Mackay, missionary at Uganda, was greatly in favor of getting hold of the youth of both sexes, and training them industrially, but chiefly educationally and spiritually. The attachment of the boys that Livingstone trained, especially the intelligent one that brought his remains to England, shows how they can be taught to attach themselves to men and ideas, if deserving. Mr. Stanley's experience is the same with those boys he had under his care, and one he brought to England. Colwyn Bay School was founded by the Rev. W. Hughes, F.R.G.S., who, some years ago, determined to go to the Congo as a missionary. Enthusiast as he was in mind, however, his body was not so strong, and he succumbed to the deadly fever, so far, that, to save his life, he was obliged to return to England. Not to be beaten, however, he determined to bring back to England with him a reminiscence of his visit to Africa, in the shape of a slave boy, who had shown a great affection for him. He ransomed the lad for the purpose by giving a bale of cloth, valued at $22.00, to the chief, whose slave he was.

This was the beginning of the little African Colony in Colwyn Bay. From one, the number has grown to ten, and the Rev. W. Hughes and his committee are preparing for housing fifty, and in addition, a number of females; and, as the funds have doubled since this time last year, there seems to be no telling where the movement will end. Through all the difficulties, trials and obstacles, the founder has believed that the inspiration to start and carry out the movement was a divine one, and he declares: "If God be with us, who shall be against us!"

One of the most interesting and useful ideas in connection with the colony, is that the youths are taught something useful in the shape of a trade. When they return to Africa they will teach people of their own color and language how to read and write, build homes, make clothes, cure diseases by the aid of medicinal herbs, engage in honest barter, avoid the savagery of heathen life, and teach the poor, dark worshipper of the fetish, to look away from the fanatical reverence of the dumb idol—to look up from nature to nature's God, to observe, chronicle, and expand upon the works of the great Creator of this world, and the everlasting glories of the spiritual life! What a work for the African!

AFRICAN STUDENTS OF THE COLWYN BAY TRAINING SCHOOL, NORTH WALES.

Three students have already returned to the Congo (Daniel Harvey, Frank Teva, and Wm. Lufwilu), all of whom are doing good work. Daniel has turned out an excellent preacher, and one of the missionaries on the Congo says, "I would give a good deal to lay my hands on another Daniel." Much, therefore, is to be expected from time to time in the future.

BIBLE IN JAVA

"I SAT in a railway carriage in Java one day," writes a missionary, "and heard a Chinaman and a native talking to each other, and one said, 'Did you ever read the Book the English people are bringing about here?' The other said, 'No.' The first said he ought to get it and read it, for it was a good Book. Here was a Chinaman recommending a Mohammedan to get the Book, and saying that it was a good Book. Traveling in Java, I was trying to press these Gospels on several men, and not one only but several told me the same thing—they had read it, and had got to know that it was full of good. A Mohammedan said to me in Malacca, 'It is too holy; if we took it up we could not cheat nor lie, nor get on in business.' I told him, as I have told others that the man who does receive the Gospel is the best in this world and in the world to come.

The Bible is having its effect where it is read, and we believe that, as it has been the reading-book of the West, by degrees it will become the reading-book of the East."

THY PEACE

MY peace I leave with you, the Master said,
I give to you;
And o'er thee rest the quiet I will shed,
For I am true.
In perfect peace that soul shall be
Whose mind is ever truly stayed on me.

Though, tribulation, too, is in the world,
Of good cheer be.
When Satan's sharp and fiery darts are hurled
I'll fight for thee.
Assure thee purified and white [bright.
With wedding garments perfect, clean and

May we in peace—thy peace—be found in thee
At that great day,
In confidence, not shamed, and watching be—
Thus in thy way.
With joyous hearts we'll hear "Well done!"
And ever reign with God's beloved Son.

SUMMER RELIGION.

IT takes more grace to be an earnest and useful Christian in summer than in any other season. The very destitute, through lack of fuel and thick clothing, may find the winter the trying season; but those comfortably circumstanced find summer the Thermopylæ that tests their Christian courage and endurance.

The spring is suggestive of God and heaven and a resurrection day. That eye must be blind that does not see God's footstep in the new grass, and hear his voice in the call of the swallow at the eaves. In the white blossoms of the orchards we find suggestion of those whose robes have been made white in the blood of the Lamb. A June morning is a door opening into heaven.

So autumn mothers a great many moral and religious suggestions. The season of corn-husking, the gorgeous woods that are becoming the catafalque of the dead year, remind the dullest of his own fading and departure.

But summer fatigues and weakens, and no man keeps his soul in as desirable a frame, unless by positive resolution and especial implorations. Pulpit and pew often get stupid together, and ardent devotion is adjourned until September.

But who can afford to lose two months out of each year, when the years are so short and so few? He who stops religious growth in July and August will require the next six months to get over it. Nay, he never recovers. At the season when the fields are most full of leafage and life, let us not be lethargic and stupid.

AN ENTIRE BIBLE

NO church of very great influence to-day but was built by those who believed in an entire Bible. Neither will a church last long built on a part of the Bible. As soon as a man begins to give up the Bible he is apt to preach in some hall, and he has an audience while he lives, and when he dies the church dies. If I thought that my church was built on a quarter of a Bible, or a half of a Bible, or three-quarters of a Bible, I would expect it to die when I die; but when I know it is built on the entire Word of God, I know it will last two hundred years after you and I sleep the last sleep. Oh the splendors of an orthodoxy which, with ten thousand hands and ten thousand pulpits and ten thousand Christian churches, is trying to save

In Music Hall, Boston, for many years stood Theodore Parker battling orthodoxy, giving it, as some supposed at the time, its death wound. He was the most fascinating man I ever heard or ever expect to hear, and I came out from hearing him, thinking, in my boyhood way, "Well," that's the death of the Church." On the same street, and not far from being opposite, stood Park Congregational Church, called by its enemies "Hell-fire Corner." Theodore Parker died, and his church died with him; or, if it is in existence, it is so small you cannot see it with the naked eye. Park Congregational Church still stands on "Hell-fire Corner," thundering away the magnificent truths of its glorious orthodoxy just as though Theodore Parker had never lived. All that Boston, or Brooklyn, or New York, or the world ever got that is worth having came through the wide aqueduct of orthodoxy from the throne of God.

Behold the splendors of character built by orthodoxy. Who had the greatest human intellect the world ever knew? Paul. In physical stature insignificant; in mind, head, and shoulders above all the giants of the age. Orthodox from scalp to heel. Who was the greatest poet the ages ever saw, acknowledged to be so both by infidels and Christians? John Milton, seeing more without eyes than anybody else ever saw with eyes. Orthodox from scalp to heel. Who was the greatest reformer the world has ever seen? so acknowledged by infidels as well as Christians. Martin Luther. Orthodox from scalp to heel.

RIGHT AT HEART.

IF you want to enter into Christian service, first of all you must have your heart right. There is no use of your trying to save a man from drowning if you yourself cannot swim. We have known men outside the Church who were anxious for the spiritual up-building of Zion, but they have accomplished very little in that direction. Their life and their personal example accomplished more in the wrong direction than their advice and counsel accomplished in the right direction. It was as though two men were walking along a road until they came to a fork in the road, and one man said, "You take the right road, it is far the best; but I am going to take the left road." The other man would not believe he was honest in his counsel. He would say to himself, "Why, if the man thought this right road was the best, he would himself take it. Now, he takes the left. I really think he must prefer the left road." In other words, you cannot lead men into the kingdom of God unless you go there yourself.

But suppose that you have your heart made right by the grace of God, and that you have become an out-and-out, through-and-through Christian, then we charge you, get ready for Christian work. The vast majority of people never think of any such preparation. If you want to be effective in different departments of Christian service, gather around you concordances and dictionaries and encyclopædia and poems and histories, and wherever you find a man who has a sharp intellect, sharpen your intellect against his.

Oh, that God would make us all earnest workers! We do not know when God is going to call us. As for ourselves we have a great ambition to have our work all done. We would rather die at forty-two years of age, our work finished, than at ninety years of age, our work only half done. Soon the journey will be through and we will lie down to rest. But the idea of rest is absurd to a man who has never worked.

PEDIGREES.

I THINK the genealogical table was put in the first chapter of the New Testament, not only to show our Lord's pedigree, but to show that a man may rise up in an ancestral line and beat back successfully all the influences of bad heredity. See in that genealogical table that good King Asa came to vile King Abia. See in that genealogical table that Joseph and Mary and the most illustrious Being that ever touched our world, or ever will touch it, had in their ancestral line scandalous Rehoboam and Tamar and Bathsheba. If this world is ever to be Edenized—and it will be—all the infected families of the earth are to be regenerated, and there will some one arise in each family line and open a new genealogical table. There will be some Joseph in the line to reverse the evil influence of Rehoboam, and there will be some Mary in the line to reverse the evil influence of Bathsheba. Perhaps the star of hope may point down to your manger. Perhaps you are to be the hero or the heroine that is to put down the brakes and stop that long train of genealogical tendencies and switch it off on another track from that on which it has been running for a century. You do that, and I will find you a fine palace as the architects of heaven can build, the archway inscribed with the words: "More than conqueror."

Subscriber, Beloit, Wis. Please explain the last clause of 1. Cor. 13: 2.

The Greek word translated in the Authorized Version, "charity" should have been rendered, "love," as it is in the Revised Version. The clause means that love is the chief of the graces. If a man does not love God and his fellow-man he has not the spirit of Christ and has not been born again.

Mrs. Maria Bennett, Cambridge, N.Y., writes: "In response to the query in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the 17th inst. from my memory I recall the following lines which may supply the verses you desire. After, "and ground our arms at Jesus' feet."

The war is o'er and we are free
To join the blood-washed company;
Our wages shall be harps of gold
And joys of heaven that can't be told:
Then we shall drink full draughts of wine,
The band of music we shall join,
Sound hallelujahs highest key
Shall be our theme eternally.

The name of the author I cannot recall though one of my ancestors knew it. I probably knew it more than seventy years ago when, as later in life, I was accustomed to sing the beautiful piece.

W. C. T., Bethlehem, Pa. 1. Do you think that the use of unfermented grape juice in the Lord's Supper fulfils the requirement, "This do in remembrance of me?" 2. Do you advise Christians not to go to the Columbian Exposition if it is open on Sunday?

1. Yes. A great deal too much is made of these details. We believe that Christ intended that his followers should meet and partake of simple refreshments as a sign of brotherhood, making at the meal a declaration of loving remembrance of him. We believe that his idea would be realized just as well if water, or tea, or coffee, or any other beverage were used. The one essential is the sense of brotherhood as followers of Christ. 2. We cannot give advice in the matter. If on considering the subject, you believe that you would be doing wrong to go, don't go. "To him that thinketh it is sin, it is sin."

Young Preacher. What is the meaning of 1. Cor. 15: 29?

All that we read about the final judgment indicates that it will be of two kinds. There will be the great separation of the sheep from the goats (Matt. 25: 32) and there will also be another and more joyful judgment, in which rewards are distributed among the children of God in proportion to the work each has done for Christ (Luke 19: 22-26). These rewards will not be given according to the prominence Christians have attained in the world, nor according to the quantity or conspicuity of the work done; but on Christ's principles of fidelity to him and his spirit. The apostle here teaches that many a servant of Christ will miss a reward, because his work has not been done in the right spirit and motive. He will be saved if he is in Christ, but his work will not be accepted.

Inquirer, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. If a person lived a consistent Christian life and was a true follower of Christ, believed that he had been baptized, but had been mistaken, dies unbaptized, would his soul be lost? 2. Will the world grow better or worse before Christ comes?

1. The very thought of such a thing is absurd. Baptism has not a particle of efficacy in the salvation of the soul. The Christian will be careful to obey this, as he will all other commands of Christ, but if, through sudden death, or through some inadvertence, he does not obey it, he will not suffer disadvantage of any kind. 2. Students of prophecy are almost unanimous in believing that while religious activity will increase and the Gospel will be more widely preached, the Church will become more worldly and the world more unbelieving and immoral as the time of the end approaches.

A. S. G. Frankford, Pa. I wish to study for the ministry, and will be grateful if you will advise me. I have to work for a living and could not study during the day. Would I be allowed by the Church to study privately, and in spare hours for the regular examination? I am in many ways qualified for the field I wish to enter. I have fluency of speech, I try to follow in the footsteps of the Saviour, and do not feel that I am presuming in wishing to enter the great vineyard to work.

In the Baptist and Congregational denominations there is not necessarily a regular examination. If a candidate, after preaching for a congregation, wins its approval, he can then be called and appointed without further formality. Pastor Spurgeon never went to a Theological Seminary and was never ordained. In the Methodist Church you would be permitted to study privately and when duly qualified would receive the necessary license, first as exhorter, then as local preacher, deacon, elder and pastor with charge, in succession. In the Presbyterian Church, as now organized, it is customary to attend a Theological Seminary.

S. Barrow, an Oriental merchant now in New York, writes: "I am a native of Mosul, Mesopotamia, and came to this country as a merchant. A short time ago, I saw a copy of your journal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in spite of my being weak in the knowledge of the English language, I tried to read it and was very much interested. Were I in possession of a better knowledge of the English, I would be delighted to translate some parts of the paper into Arabic, and send it to my people and friends at Mosul. Your paper is of great value to me, and I have now decided to be a subscriber to it, hoping that by reading it, I may obtain the religious benefit which young people are in great want of."

Mrs. S. A. M. R., Edenton, N.C., writes: "I have a friend who for years was sadly given to drink, cruel at home, and reduced to utter poverty. One night, three years since, he staggered home and fell on the sofa. His wife was reading one of Dr. Talmage's sermons and immediately commenced to read aloud. He would mutter to her to stop, but she would not, little thinking he could get sober enough to listen. Soon she heard sob after sob, and then went to him. He was perfectly sober, and so repentant and contrite that she was obliged to send at 10 o'clock at night for her minister. He went and remained with the husband till he was composed, with the promise to be at his bedside the next morning at 8 o'clock. The man has never tasted liquor since, is doing well in business, and handsomely supporting a lovely family. I told the wife I would have that sermon printed in gilt letters, frame it, and hang it on my wall, that it might be read by all. She did not do that, but I know she feels that God visited him through you."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

New Discoveries in Bible Lands.

REFERENCE has already been made in these columns to the wonderful discovery of an ancient manuscript of the Gospels in the convent on Mount Sinai. The discoverer was Mrs. Lewis, whose late husband was an erudite clergyman who at the time of his death was librarian of the University of Cambridge. Mrs. Lewis is a lady of remarkable scholarship and it is to that fact that we are indebted for her discovery. She and her sister have been making a tour in Bible lands, and during a visit to the Convent of St. Catharine obtained permission to examine some of the ancient manuscripts in its library. One of these was in a very bad state of preservation, having been cast aside by the monks as of no use. Its leaves were dirty and were stuck together. Mrs. Lewis caught sight of a word in one of them which arrested her attention. It was the Syriac word for "Gospel." She determined to examine it closely. With the steam from her traveling teakettle, she carefully separated the leaves. She found that the writing was merely the lives of saints, but they had been written over other writing which had almost faded out. She obtained permission to apply chemicals to it, which had the effect of bringing up the faded writing underneath. It was then at once evident that the discovery was of inestimable value, for the faded writing, on becoming legible, proved to be the oldest manuscript of the Gospels extant, and was perfect, with the exception of the first part of the Gospel of John. At that part, some pages had been torn out. Mrs. Lewis spent considerable time in the neighborhood, studying and making photographs. One of these, reproduced on this page, is a photograph of a great rock, having a deep fissure in it which, tradition says, is the rock which Moses struck when the people needed water, and from which the miraculous stream flowed (Numbers 20:8–11.)

The Tramp's Choice.

A saloon-keeper at Tampa, Ga., was behind his bar one day, recently, when a miserable-looking man entered, and telling a deplorable story of want and suffering, begged for relief. The saloon-keeper was no stranger to the signs on the man's face and he perceived that his real trouble was protracted dissipation. "If I gave you money," he said, "you would go and get drunk with it." The man protested vehemently. "Well," said the saloon-keeper, "I will try you. I will lock you in that room with a glass of whiskey and a five-dollar bill. If, at the end of an hour, you have not drunk the whiskey you shall have the money." The tramp's eyes glistened at the sight of the bill, and he readily agreed. Ten minutes after he had entered the room he clamored to be released. He had drunk the whiskey. Although he could have gained five dollars by one hour's abstinence, he was unable to resist his craving. The fact is a remarkable evidence of the power of the liquor habit. There is too much reason to fear that his ultimate fate and that of others like him, did we know it, would furnish a still more startling proof. Though they know that through indulgence they will lose their souls they will not abstain. (Gal. 5 : 21.)

Tramping 2,500 Miles.

A MAN arrived at San Antonio, Texas, on June 1, who had walked twenty-five hundred miles. A little over a year ago he came to New York from Sweden. He hoped to secure employment as a clerk, but was unable to do so. He remained here searching for work until all his money was spent and he was in dire straits. Seeing an offer of employment in Central America he applied and was accepted. He expected to be employed as a clerk or timekeeper, but when he arrived he was sent to a place named Livingston to work on a banana plantation. He was required to work in the hot sun from early morning until night and there was no compensation but food and lodging. Both were bad, the former being deficient in quantity as well as unwholesome. He became sick with malarial fever, but his employers had no mercy on him. He was driven to his work every morning and compelled to keep at it all day, although he swooned several times from weakness and pain. He perceived that there was no prospect of any alleviation and that nothing but death awaited him as the end of all his labor, if he remained; and he determined to make his escape. He waited only for strength for the terrible journey. The hope seemed to help his recovery and just after Christmas he succeeded in slipping away unobserved. He left his surplus clothes and all his belongings behind him and set out to walk. He had great difficulty in procuring food on his way, and at times could cover but a few miles in the day; but he persevered and finally reached San Antonio six months after setting out. He was completely worn out and was sent to the hospital for medical treatment. It is much to be wished that men who are in the service of Satan, and who know that the end of their way is death, would show a similar determination to escape, even if like this man they have to sacrifice all their possessions and endure hardship. (II. Timothy 2: 26.)

A Lost Diamond.

A REMARKABLE story of the loss of a valuable diamond ring appears in the St. Louis Republic. It appears that a gentleman well known in that city has a ring containing a very fine stone for which he had paid a very large sum of money and of which he was very proud. He was in the habit of driving out into the country to visit some friends who are farmers. The chief attraction, it turns out, was one of the farmer's daughters to whom he is soon to be married. The crucial question was asked and answered during a drive which he persuaded the young lady to take with him. To seal the engagement, he took off his favorite ring and placed it on her finger. The ring was too large for her, and before they returned to the farm, it had slipped off. The buggy was thoroughly searched, but the ring was not there. Then a search was made for it along the road, and the farmer and several of his family joined in the quest. There had been considerable rain and the country-roads were soft and muddy, so that the ring might easily have been trodden out of sight. It could not be found, and when darkness fell, the search was abandoned. During the evening, some of the boys were in the yard chatting about the event of the day and one of them absent-mindedly pecked with his pocket-knife at the lumps of mud adhering to the wheels of the buggy, as it stood in the yard. As a lump of dirt fell, something glistened. The boy stooped and looked at it and there he saw the lost ring. It must have fallen in the wagon track, and have been immediately picked up by the wheel and carried two or three miles. One can imagine the joy its restoration would afford the young lady who had lost it. As the pledge of her engagement it would be precious, far above its intrinsic value. Its loss must have been to her a cause of sorrow such as the Christian feels when he loses the assurance of his union with Christ. He, too, will recover his treasure more quickly and more surely, not by going back to the period of his conversion, but by removing the impurity he has collected in traveling through the world's miry ways. (Isa. 1: 16-18.)

Exile Worse than Jail.

THERE was general surprise in Philadelphia on May 31, when an ex-State Senator who has been a fugitive from justice for three years, voluntarily surrendered himself. Some years ago he was connected with the management of a Bank and a Life Insurance Company. Both were wrecked and there was good ground for believing that the ruin was caused by a fraudulent conspiracy. The Senator with three colleagues were all indicted and the latter were convicted. One was sentenced to four years imprisonment and the other two to shorter terms. The Senator made good his escape and has been living for three years in Brazil and occasionally in Europe. He avoided countries in which an extradition treaty could reach him and he knew that he was safe from arrest. His state of mind, however, has been one of continual unrest. Remorse and the longing for the sight of his native land and familiar scenes and faces made his life miserable. He grew worse daily, until, at last, he came to the conclusion that no punishment, however severe, would be so hard to bear as his mental suffering. He therefore came back and surrendered himself. He was sentenced to four years imprisonment in the Penitentiary. Much has been said about the punishment of those who die impenitent, but a fact like this shows that the human mind is so constituted that if the punishment consisted of nothing more than remorse and exile from the presence of God it would be intolerable. (Luke 13: 28.)

Measuring Electricity.

The mystery about the system by which the electric light companies learn how much electricity is used by their customers, was explained, in the course of a trial in a Brooklyn court, last week. The company had charged the customer a larger sum than he considered he ought to pay, and they sued him for the amount. The manager of the company said that it was impossible there could be any mistake to the disadvantage of the customer, as the meter could not register more than was used. The instrument consisted of two discs of metal suspended in a jar of acid. They are connected with wires in such a way that when the current passes through them, one piece is decomposed, and the other gains the particles of metal detached from its companion. The electricity supplied to the customer must pass through the jar, and the process of disintegration and accumulation goes on only during the time that the electric current is turned on. At certain intervals the two pieces of metal are taken out and weighed, and the difference in the weight of each indicates how long they have been subjected to the action of the electricity, and consequently how long the lights in the house have been kept burning. The same result might be reached from the weight of either piece of metal, but is made absolutely certain when both are weighed. An analogous principle applied to the two natures that every man possesses, would reveal the extent to which the Christian's light had been kept burning. While it shines, his higher nature gains in strength and purity, while his lower nature loses its power. (Rom. 8: 10.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The managers of the American Bible Society had the pleasure of welcoming Rev. Francis Penzotti, of Peru, at their recent meeting. Mr. Penzotti has suffered a long imprisonment in Peru for acting as the Society's agent in the distribution of Bibles. He is now on a visit to New York and is enjoying the rest and change after his arduous labors.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller has given $150,000 toward the half million dollar endowment of the University of Chicago. This with Mr. Martin A. Ryerson's gift of $100,000, and $100,000 raised from other sources leaves $150,000 still to be raised within three months or the Ryerson and Rockefeller gifts will be lost to the university.

Mr. J. Hubley Ashton, one of the counsel engaged in the cases of the Chinese under the Geary Law, recently said to a reporter that the Chinese Government has already informed the State Department that if the Chinese are deported as required by the Geary law, all relations with China — diplomatic, commercial and otherwise — may be considered as terminated. The Americans now in China will be ordered to withdraw, and our trade with China will cease. Great concern is felt for the safety of the missionries.

A recent dispatch from Corea says that a grievous wrong has been done Dr. W. J. Hall, whose letters on medical mission work in that country have appeared from time to time in this journal. He was enabled to purchase a house for mission work in Seoul; but complaint was made in the courts against him, under an old law forbidding the ownership of real estate by foreigners. The man who sold the house to him has been arrested and imprisoned and the transaction declared cancelled. The house has been taken from Dr. Hall, but the purchase money has not been returned to him.

Mr. D. L. Moody asks us to remind our readers, who may visit Chicago during the World's Fair, that lectures on Bible topics are given at the Bible Institute, 80 Institute Place, every day, except Sunday and Monday, at 9 and 11 o'clock. They are open to every one, and visitors are cordialy welcomed. Among the lecturers are Professors W. G. Moorhead and J. M. Stifler, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston; Dr. Theo. Monod, of Paris, and Rev. John McNeill and Hubert Brooke, of London.

Mr. D. L. Moody announces that at the close of the Young Women's Conference at Northfield, the World's Student Convention will be held commencing July 1st, and continuing twelve days. Among the speakers will be Prof. Drummond of Glasgow, Prof. Purves of Princeton, and Prof. Jacobus of Hartford. On August 1st will be the General Conference of Christian Workers, at which Rev. B. Fay Mills, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Rev. John McNeil and other eminent men are expected to attend. Mr. Moody will preside at all three conferences.

Evangelist Francis E. Smiley has been much blessed in his meetings at Dunbar, Pa. Churches of all demoninations have united in the work and meetings have been held alternately in the Presbyterian and Methodist churches. The newspapers of the town say that in the shops, the offices, and on the streets, men are heard speaking of religious matters as never before.

The First (Old South) Church of Worcester, Mass., has been enjoying a period of blessing unprecedented in its history. Three hundred and thirty three members have been received into membership since the present pastor, Dr. A. Z. Conrad began his labors there in 1891. Of this large number 122 have joined the church on profession of faith this year.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

MARKS OF THE LORD JESUS.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, June 11, 1893, in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Gal. 6: 17.

THIS has always seemed to me to be a very tender and touching passage of Scripture. It has a plaintiveness and sweetness peculiarly its own. The apostle Paul found the Galatians, what all writers have agreed in styling them, a very fickle people. At the first they were devotedly attached to this noble apostle. They received his instructions with the utmost confidence; and they obeyed his commandments with the utmost heartiness. The apostle bears testimony to their love for him when he says, "I bear you record that if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes and have given them to me." This testimony suggests, as many have supposed, that Paul's thorn in the flesh was weakness of the eyes; it also shows that the Galatians had formed a most ardent attachment for him as their teacher. It shows also that their love was changeful, and that the time came when the apostle deeply regretted that they had been "so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel." They were a people who had been rescued from heathenism of a peculiarly gross and debasing character. They worshipped "the mother of the gods" under names and forms that were utterly degrading. Heathen writers call them "a foolish people." They were, however, a great people physically. They were of three different tribes and nations, and are mentioned by all historians as a tall and brave people.

A Disturbing Element.

Their fickleness was seen in that so soon as the apostle had left them they were turned away from the simplicity of the gospel. It is clear that Judaizing teachers went amongst them and induced them to observe the rites of the Jewish faith. These teachers claimed to have come directly from Jerusalem and to be acting under apostolic authority. They perverted the doctrine which the apostle had taught and affirmed that he was inferior to the apostles in Jerusalem. They endeavored to set at naught his authority, because if he were an apostle at all he had been recently called to the apostolic office, and they insisted that his teachings were inferior to those of the teachers in Jerusalem. They urged also that the laws of Moses were still obligatory, and they led many of the Galatians to submit to the distinctive Jewish rite and to observe some of the Jewish festivals. It is evident that great discussions soon arose in the church and that direct instruction from the apostle was necessary to prevent the spreading of dissension and the possible dissolution of the church.

The apostle Paul showed clearly in this epistle that his commission was received immediately from God; that he had not been instructed by other apostles, that he did not acknowledge their authority and that he did not need to have additional proof of his apostleship. He claimed apostles at Jerusalem. Although he had not [illegible] his death, he was supernaturally ordained by him to his apostolic office. He did not hesitate to differ from Peter [illegible] the apostles was clearly wrong. He also in this [illegible] justification by faith and shows that those who trust in the rites of Judaism dishonor the finished work of the Lord Jesus. Most gloriously does he exalt Christ as the all-sufficient Saviour of men. In this connection he proves clearly that the Mosaic ritual was only temporary in duration and introductory in design. Its highest glory was that it was preparatory to the coming of Christ and was designed to lead to him for salvation. The controlling purpose of the epistle is to state and prove the true doctrine of justification by faith, and so he shows that even Abraham was justified by faith rather than by obedience to a ritual.

To Rank With the Highest

We see clearly that the opposition made to the apostle caused him great sorrow. He has now reached the close of the epistle and he speaks with a tenderness which reaches the heart of every reader. He says "from henceforth," that is for the remainder of my life, whether it be long or short, "let no man trouble me; for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." His call to the apostolic office had been questioned; his authority to explain and to defend the Gospel had been doubted. Clearly does he vindicate himself at both of these points; fully does he prove the divine authority of exhaustively also has he explained the great doctrine of justification by faith, showing that the law of Moses is no longer binding; and now, in a tone of mingled authority, resignation, affection and conscious injury, he begs them to give him no more trouble on these points. He surely had sorrow enough to bear. He reminds them, with varied and contradictory emotions, that there is another kind of proof of his apostolic office and authority. It is a delicate proof for him to produce. The thought is as if he had said, "I have not before alluded to this form of proof. It is with hesitancy that I now mention it, but the circumstances of the case justify the delicate allusion. Look at me. Behold and see that I bear in my body the conclusive proofs of my apostleship. These marks I received in the service of my Lord. These wounds are witnesses that I am truly a soldier of the Captain of our salvation, and an apostle of the Lord Jesus. I have need of your prayful sympathy rather than of your critical comments and your captious opposition. It is almost humiliating to me that I have been compelled to vindicate my apostleship in this tender and personal way. Do you doubt my loyalty? Let these 'stigmata' be the answers to your carping criticisms. Suffering as I do in my scarred and feeble body it is positively painful to me to call attention to these delicate matters." Beloved hearers, this line of remark which I have put into the mouth of the apostle is very touching. It is an appeal which is gentle as it is mighty. It moves our hearts after the lapse of the centuries. It must have tenderly touched the fickle nature of these Galatians. It is indeed a touch both of nature and grace which makes the whole Church of God kin.

The Sacred Stigmata.

It is fitting that we should here ask what the apostle means by "the marks of the Lord Jesus." Many commentators have called attention to the fact that the word "stigmata," here translated marks, properly means the brands which were burnt into the body. It is well known that slaves were often branded in this way by their owners so as to make their escape less likely and to make their discovery more certain should they escape. We know also that devotees of certain idol gods in the excitement of their fanatical devotion often imprinted upon their flesh images of the gods whom they adored. Barnes quotes Herodotus as mentioning a temple of Hercules in Egypt in which if any slave took refuge and had the sacred stigmata placed upon him, he was ever afterward considered as devoted to the god whose image he bore, and no man could afterward lawfully injure him. Some have supposed that the apostle Paul here referred to the image of the Lord Jesus as impressed upon him in a similar way; others have supposed that he refers to the form of the cross as being impressed upon some part of his person. Romanists have used his language in the attempt to justify the most extravagant vagaries of their idolatrous beliefs in connection with the face and cross of the Lord Jesus. But such interpretations are fanciful. The apostle simply means to say that in the service of his Master he had received marks as the result of the sufferings which he had endured because of his loyal devotion. In II. Cor. 11: 24-25, he says, "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep." In the succeeding verses he gives us an astonishing catalogue of his perils of robbers, and of his perils in the city and in the sea. The catalogue which he gives no one in whose breast there is a heart and not a stone can read without profound emotion. Doubtless it is to such experiences as these that he refers in the text. In his body there were then marks of his heroic service for Christ; they were the witnesses of his apostolic commission and apostolic fervor. Some had in their body the marks of Jewish rites; he the marks of Christian service. Some the images of idols whom they worshipped; he the weals which he had received, from scourges and rods in the hands of the enemies of his Master. How could he possibly give more striking to Jesus? A few weeks ago a brave soldier in our late war showed me with pride the scar which he bears of a wound received before Richmond in a decisive engagement. Of that scar he was rightfully proud. It was an evidence of his devotion to his country and his service in the preservation of the Union. Many an old soldier during the exercises of Memorial Day pointed with pardonable pride to similar evidences of his devotion to his country and his sufferings in her honor. The popular commentator to whom I have already referred quotes Lafayette, when struck in the foot by a musket ball at Germantown, as saying, "I prize this wound as among the most valued of my honors" Without boasting, but with a justifiable pride, the apostle Paul could point to the scourgings which he had received as the pledges of his consecration to the cause of the Lord Jesus. Could any words more closely touch the tenderest spots of the heart than those which are my text this morning? Chrysostom doubtless catches the true thought when he reminds us that Paul does not say "I have," but "I bear" in my body. Paul bore these scars as one is proud of trophies.

Evidence of His Devotion

All Christians now should bear in some form the "marks of the Lord Jesus." They are not now called upon to suffer for their faith as was the apostle Paul and as were the martyrs who followed him in Christian service, but there are or we have no evidence that we belong to Christ. There is a spirit which we must possess and manifest or we cannot prove that we are Christ's. What are some of the marks which we ought to bear, which men ought to see as the proofs that we are not our own but Christ's? Such marks are worth more than all the honors which this world can bestow. The time is coming when the "marks of the Lord Jesus" will be worth more than ribbon or star indicating even the loftiest rank among men, worth more than ducal coronet or kingly crown. Do we possess those marks? This question is the most important which we can be asked of any human being. What then are some of the marks of the Lord Jesus which we ought to possess?

But a few can be mentioned, but these are so inclusive that they imply the possession of others of like character. Obedience to the will of God is one of the distinctive marks of the Lord Jesus which we may possess. The obedience of Christ was unquestioning, unvarying and unparalleled. It was the controlling characteristic of his earthly life. David, speaking in the fortieth psalm as a type of Jesus, said, "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart." All the way from Bethlehem to Calvary the spirit of obedience to the will of God was one of the marks of the life of the Lord Jesus. At the age of twelve when he said to his parents, who found him after seeking him with anxiety, "How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Already the solemn duties and the sublime achievements of his earthly life were pressing upon his boyish mind and heart. This sense of obedience is one of the distinctive characteristics of the Lord in connection with his baptism. When John hesitated to baptize his Lord the answer of that Lord was, "Suffer it to be so now: for [illegible] to fulfill all righteousness." How should the pure and holy Son of God submit to an ordinance which is the sinner's and not the Saviour's ordinance? He took upon himself our nature, not only that he might be "made sin for us," but also that he might set us a perfect example of obedience to the law of God. Had he refused to submit to the act of baptism he would have left incomplete the perfect righteousness which he came to manifest. He shows that this act of holy obedience should be performed by every true disciple, and that its neglect leaves something of the required righteousness unfulfilled. For the time being, he making John the Baptist the actor while Jesus the Christ was the recipient of the divine ordinance. The apostle Paul in Romans 5: 19 teaches us that, "As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous;" and in Hebrews 5: 8 we have the striking words, "Though he were a son yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered." The same spirit of obedience was gloriously shown in Gethsemane when he submitted to the will of God by drinking to its dregs the painful cup. The apostle Paul in writing to the Philippians emphasizes the thought that Christ became obedient unto death even the death of the cross. His exaltation to the right hand of God stands in close relation to his ignominious humiliation on the cross.

This spirit of obedience is one of the marks of the Lord Jesus which we ought to possess. We are commanded to repent and be baptized. We dare not separate between these divine commands. Both are personal acts, both should receive our prompt and joyful obedience. We are to believe in the Lord Jesus and to confess him before men—are to accept and to declare his righteousness. We ought never to ask: Is this or that command essential to salvation? To us the voice of the Master comes saying, in response to our querulous questioning regarding the essentiality of this or that command, "What is that to thee? follow thou me." Finely does Matthew Henry say, "It ought to be the great care of every one of us to follow the Lord fully. We must in a course of obedience to God's will and service to his honor follow him universally, without dividing; uprightly, without dissembling; cheerfully, without disputing; and constantly, without declining; and this is following him fully." We must obey although we do not fully know the reason for the divine requirement. God knows best, and our highest wisdom is in accepting his will as our highest law. The first obligation of the Order of St. Francis was unquestioning submission to the authority of the superior. We are told that when a monk proved refractory a grave was dug deep enough to enable a man to stand therein.

The Disobedient Monk

was put into it and his associates shovelled in the earth, while the superior looked on without an emotion of tenderness. The earth reaches the knees of the stubborn monk. St. Francis stooping down asked, "Are you dead yet?" There was no answer. The burial went on until the earth reached to the waist, to the shoulders, and finally to the lips. Once more St. Francis bending down said, "Are you dead yet?" A little more dirt thrown into the grave and the rebellious monk would be suffocated. No longer might he resist. The iron will of the superior could not be broken; that of the monk must yield, or death would be his fate. "I am dead," said he, and his release was immediately ordered. In a higher and nobler sense we are to be dead to self, to sin, and the world, and we are to be alive to Christ. We are his only as we do his commandments; obedience alone proves our friendship to him and our true discipleship in his church. His own words are, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." Only as our faith takes the form of practical obedience is it helpful to us or acceptable to God. Noble was the spirit of who forbade a battle with the enemy, and whose son challenged and defeated that enemy, who, when the son came in triumph carrying the spoils won from the enemy, refused to give him honor because he had disobeyed his father's and commander's orders. Even though his disobedience resulted in victory it was more worthy of death than honor. Beautiful were the words spoken by the mother of Jesus when she said to the servant at the marriage in Cana, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." These words might be written on the first page of every Bible, over the vestibule of every church, over the head of every preacher, and in the heart of every disciple. Beautiful the words of the old prophet, "To obey is better than sacrifice." What is it to be a Christian? This: To obey Jesus Christ. Obedience proves faith, love, joy and every grace.

Another mark is a life of holy zeal in the cause of God and man. This mark is kindred to the one already presented. Christ's life gives us many illustrations of this characteristic. In

Mark 3: 21 we read that his friends said, "He is beside himself." They could not understand the spirit which prompted his unresisting service in the cause of God. We read of his performing miracles during the day and retiring to the mountain to pray during the hours of the night. He spent the night in prayer before calling his twelve apostles. He often spent hours in silent communion with God. Men could not understand the secret of his all-consuming zeal. His life was summed up in the most suggestive remark, "He went about doing good." The world knows us not because it knew him not. Men now call devoted, enthusiastic, zealous and fanatics and fools. Christ showed us that true enthusiasm in religion is the highest reason. If we truly believed what we profess we would be amazed at our coldness in the cause of God. Christ worked and prayed until after the sun had set, and then we are told that he arose a great while before dawn to resume his works of love to men and of obedience to God. He said to himself, "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is called day." The most dangerous of all "isms" in the church of God is indifferentism. The most fervent Christian is amazed at his own lack of fervor. How can we be indifferent when men about us are without God and without hope? True zeal is one of the noblest elements of power in the Christian life. It is the highest Christian principle set on fire by divine love. It is love fanned to a white heat. A Christian without zeal is a sacrifice without fire. Zeal drives the disciple to an unflagging and ever joyous service. It made Whitefield and Wesley mightier than Butler and Watson although their inferiors in mental attainments. We need this zeal to-day to melt the icebergs, and to burn up the hay, wood and stubble in our churches. Oh, for a burning devotion, for a fiery zeal, for a quenchless love! A sleeping church is the devil's best ally. We are told that when Napoleon invaded Egypt he met a force protected by a mud fort. This fort defied all his efforts. If it had been rock, he would have blown it up with powder; if it had been wood, he would have fired it with rockets; but it was mud. The missiles he hurled into it increased its power of resistance. It is said that he left it in despair. A sleeping church is

Consecrated Christians

A Mud Fort.

God help us to awake and to put on our strength, and to do our duty as followers of the Lord Jesus! Quaintly does Luther say that, "The devil held a great anniversary at which his emissaries were convened to report the results of their several missions. One said, 'I let loose the wild beasts of the desert on a caravan of Christians and their bones are now bleaching on the sands.' 'What of that?' said the devil, 'their souls were all saved.' Another said, 'I drove the east wind against a ship freighted with Christians and all were drowned.' 'What of that?' said the devil, 'their souls were all saved.' But a third said, 'For ten years I tried to get a single Christian asleep. I succeeded and left him sleeping.' Then the devil rejoiced and the night stars of hell also shouted for joy." In all our churches there are to-day sleeping Christians. Oh, if we could but appreciate the value of a soul! If we could, as the seraphic Summerfield said, "take a look into eternity" how we would beseech men to be reconciled unto God!

We need the mark of the love of self-sacrifice, a life not lived for itself, but for God and for man. This truth Christ taught from the cradle to the grave, taught in words and in acts. When we become Christians we profess to die to self. We profess that our body, soul and spirit are Christ's. We declare that we have been bought with a price, and that we are bound to serve God in our bodies and spirits. We cannot have any proof for ourselves or for others that we are Christ's, except some of these marks are found upon us.

The best proof that we are Christians is that we are Christ-like. We ought not to be obliged to give evidence that we are Christians; our lives in themselves ought to be such evidences. There is irresistible power in the possession of these marks of the Lord Jesus. No one can long misinterpret their testimony. They are self-evidencing proof that we have passed from death unto life. Oh, to-day bow at the cross, and receive Christ as your personal Saviour! Let this act of obedience be the first mark in your soul. Then ask with Paul on the Damascus highway, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Then run with joy in the way of his commandments, and when men ask one of us questions, carping, unreasonable, unanswerable questions, we can say with deep humility, with holy joy and with conclusive argument, "Henceforth let no man trouble me for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

1. "There shall be show-ers of bless-ing:" This is the promise of love;
2. "There shall be show-ers of bless-ing"—Precious re-viv-ing a-gain;
3. "There shall be show-ers of bless-ing:" Send them upon us, O Lord;
4. "There shall be show-ers of bless-ing:" Oh, that to-day they might fall,
There shall be sea-sons re-fresh-ing, Sent from the Saviour a-bove.
O-ver the hills and the val-leys, Sound of abundance of rain.
Grant to us now a re-fresh-ing, Come, and now honor Thy Word.
Now as to God we're con-fess-ing, Now as on Je-sus we call!
CHORUS.
Show- -ers of bless-ing,
Showers, showers of bless-ing, Show-ers of bless-ing we need;
Mercy-drops round us are fall-ing, But for the showers we plead.

A MITE FOR HIS CAUSE.

SENTINEL! what threatening shadows
Gather o'er your lofty spire?
Why obscured the light of noon-day
By this deepening gloom so dire?

Is it Legion's forces hovering
O'er the Tabernacle grand!
Come to storm this Christian fortress
With a stern, relentless hand?

Have they come to take the Temple
Which is now so justly famed?
Come to give these courts to Satan
Where the Christ is now proclaimed?

Up! and sound the pealing trumpet,
There is danger in delay;
Let its echoes, far resounding,
Summon Christians for the fray!

Haste! and brief will be the conflict—
Long the cause of Christ will live—
Speed! ye valiant Christian soldiers,
ALL FOR JESUS freely give!

Give! and yet the Tabernacle
To God's glory strong will stand!
Give! and still will roll the Gospel
From its portals through the land!—HABER.

LET ME LEAN HARDER ON THEE.

IF ever my feet shall grow weary
While burdens are pressing me sore,
And I am not led by still waters,
But tread on a storm-smitten shore:
Oh let not my heart ever falter,
Or question thy goodness to me;
But draw me, oh Saviour, still closer,
And let me lean harder on thee.

If those I have trusted should fail me,
And those that my heart has held dear
Should sever the sweet ties of friendship
That bound us for many a year:
Then leave me not utterly lonely,
Come closer than brother can be;
Oh, whisper of love everlasting,
And let me lean harder on thee.

When grief overshadows my journey,
When I must pass under the rod,
When death's angel enters my dwelling,
And takes my beloved to God;
Or when I must tread the dark waters,
And Jordan shall roll over me,
Be near me, my Saviour, be near me,
And let me lean harder on thee.

THE APOSTASY.

The Progessive Decadence and Corruption of the Church before the Advent.

BY THOMAS NEWBERRY.

THERE are two events which must intervene between "the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our gathering together unto him," and the day of Christ, when the Son of Man shall appear and every eye see him.

The first of these is "a falling away," literally "the apostasy" of the outward professing Church from its original standing. The second is the revelation of the man of sin. The kingdom of the heavens is likened unto a man who sowed good seed in his field, among which the enemy sowed tares (Matt. 12). The explanation is this: He that sowed the good seed is the Son of Man, the field is the world, the good seed are the children of the kingdom, the tares are the children of the wicked one. At the time of the harvest the tares are bound in bundles; this process, I believe, is going on now. Various forms of error are associating men together, and binding them fast. There is a lukewarm holding of old-established truths which are being supplanted by rationalistic opinions, advanced thought, &c. While in the professing Church there is a turning again to the weak and beggarly elements of a former dispensation, utterly destitute of its reality and power. The tares having been bound, the wheat will be gathered into the garner. This will be "the coming our Lord Jesus and our gathering together unto him," leaving the tares to dry for burning at the end of the age.

Similarly the parable of the drag net teaches that when it is full it is drawn to shore, the good fish are gathered into vessels, and the bad cast out. There is now unusual activity in the harvest field, for the night is coming, the storm is gathering, and the Gospel net is being cast into new waters. A time is coming when true believers will be gathered home, but when those making a profession without reality—that is, without oil in the vessel, or the Spirit of God in the heart—will be left outside the door; a time when the faithful servant will enter into the joy of his Lord, but the unfaithful one will have his portion with the hypocrites. In a moment—the twinkling of an eye—all who belong to Christ sealed with the Spirit will be caught up; then the outward professing Church, destitute of the Spirit, the carcase without life, will remain.

Those constituting the true Church of God having been removed, the false Church assumes its true character, as described in Rev. 12, as Babylon the Great, becoming as Christ calls it in Rev. 3, the Synagogue of Satan. This will be the Church of the future, with its magnificent ritual and worldly grandeur.

In Rev. 12, the angel shows John in vision this Church of the future under the symbol of a woman sitting on a scarlet-colored beast, decked or gilded with gold and precious stones and pearls.

This will be the dominant religion of the day, usurping authority over the State, and prostituting to her own purpose all that is Divinely precious, spiritually excellent and beautiful. That which will give the wine in her cup, its intoxicating power will be its subtle mixture of the Divine with the human, the spiritual with the carnal, the heavenly with the earthly, the true and the false; so that the religious, and even the godly, are in danger of being carried away. Hence the solemn warning, needful even now, "Come out of her, my people."

After the first three-and-a-half years of Daniel's seventieth week of years, he who was the head of the beast on which the woman sits becomes Antichrist, opposing himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped. Then the apostate Church allies herself with him as the associate of the beast, and instead of being the Church of God and the Temple of the Holy Ghost, becomes "the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird" (Rev. 13: 2). This is the consummation of her falling away, her final apostacy.

And instead of being ready for the coming of Christ, she becomes so abominable that outraged humanity can endure it no longer, insomuch that the ten kings combined obliterate the apostate Church from the face of the earth, so that not even the Church's counterfeit will be on the scene when the Lord comes to take vengeance on the beast and the false prophet.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

CONSECRATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing June 25. II. Chron. 29: 25 36.

IT is a spectacle far apart from nineteenth century life that is sketched for us in the passage selected for the topic. The slain beasts, the streams of blood, the priests hurriedly flaying the carcases and the smoke of sacrifice ascending heavenward —all these form a picture which is quite foreign to our idea of religious service. Yet the ideal of religious life is here under the coarse and repulsive imagery. The spirit and disposition of the people, which found expression in these ancient rites, are the same spirit and disposition that are required of the servants of God to-day. In the clearer light of our time we have learned that the slaughter of beasts is not acceptable worship; but we have not yet fully learned that sacrifice is still necessary. Not less but more is required of us. We too have an altar, and an offering must be made there. It is our privilege, as well as our duty and joy to offer ourselves on that altar. Conversion means all that, and sanctification is not possible without it. To the self-indulgent Christian there comes no true spiritual life, or development. The law of self-sacrifice is the law of his life. He has to make his lower life a sacrifice to his higher life; his time and effort and property must be sacrificed to his fellowman; and all his desires, and passions and his very will must be sacrificed, that God may reign in him supreme over all. That is the way of the Cross and the way of life. He that would save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for Christ's sake and the Gospel's shall save it.

THE Y. W. C. A. AT CHICAGO

THE Young Women's Christian Association of Chicago is making a special effort to care for young and respectable girls who come alone to that city, secure for them such homes as may be fitting and at least direct to suitable lodging houses. This work will be under the general care of the Travelers' Aid Department, which the Association has carried on for about four years. Agents wearing a blue badge marked "Young Women's Christian Association" meet the trains to assist any who may need help. No charge is made for the service. They are instructed not to address strangers, but watch until their badge is seen. It is the desire of the Association that those who propose to visit the city should, three days before leaving home, address the agent, Miss Anson, 5830 Rosalie Court, Jackson Park, Chicago, giving the exact date and time of starting as well as the railroad they will come over.

THE PHILADELPHIA C. E UNION

THE Christian Endeavor Union of Philadelphia is a wonderful exhibition of Christian brotherhood in aggressive work. It comprises over three hundred societies from all denominations and having an aggregate membership of more than fifteen thousand. It has four branches, viz: Northeast, Northwest, Germantown and West Philadelphia. Each branch is fully equipped with officers as is the Central Union. The Union has also a complete organization of Committees, Lookout, Social, Press, Correspondence and Meetings. It is like attending a great Christian Endeavor Convention to be at one of the Union meetings. They are held once a month. The President of the Union is Mr. William A. Gillespie, who is an enthusiastic believer in the value of Christian Endeavor and a most energetic and indefatigable worker.

A SECRETARY OF THE B. Y. P. U.

[illegible] of the Young People's movement is Rev. Robert F. Y. Pierce, pastor of the State Street Baptist Church of Rockford, Ill., and Recording Secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union, whose portrait by the courtesy of the Young People's Union, we publish on this page. Mr. Pierce was born at Salem, N. J., and his early education was received in the public schools and the Academy of his native town. After two years' clerkship in his father's store, having expressed a desire to be a teacher, he entered the State Normal School at Trenton and graduated in 1871. He taught for twelve years and was eminently successful, about 6,000 pupils being under his care, many of whom are filling positions of responsibility and trust in all parts of the country. He early exhibited energy and tact, and had been Principal of two Academies before he was twenty-one. At his majority he was chosen Principal Instructor in the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind at Philadelphia, the office held by the late Hon. James G. Blaine when he began his career.

Mr. Pierce gave much attention to Convention work among secular teachers, and organized the American Normal Institute, afterward embraced in the Chautauqua work. Soon after he began teaching he resumed the study of medicine, commenced in his boyhood, which he pursued diligently for nearly eight years. At the end of that time he came to the conclusion that it was his duty to devote his life to the work of the ministry. He began preaching as opportunity afforded but continued teaching until 1884 when he accepted the charge of the mission work in Philadelphia, organized and maintained by Mr. John B. Stetson. Here his work was crowned with notable success. He was ordained March 4, 1885, and accepted the call of the First Baptist Church of Mount Holly, N. J., Nov. 1, 1887.

During his five years pastorate nearly three hundred united with the church by baptism, and the church edifice was handsomely remodeled. Last year he was urged to acccept a call from the State Street Church, Rockford, Ill., and already the Lord is richly blessing the union of pastor and people. Twenty-three have recently been baptized and the church rejoices in a revival interest. He organized one of the first local B. Y. P. U's. east of the Ohio river and was instrumental in the organization of the New Jersey B. Y. P. U., the first State Union in the East. Mr. Pierce is known in Sunday School work all over the country for his excellent blackboard lessons.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN PARIS.

THE new building of the French Young Men's Christian Association was recently opened and dedicated. It is situated on Rue Trevise, No. 14, within three minutes' walk of the crossing of Rue Faubourg Montmartre, the great centre of Paris. A French architect visited this country, and, after examining a number of the best Association buildings, prepared in New York the plans for the building, under the supervision of the most experienced Association men. The building fronts on Rue Trevise, and is cream white, in marked contrast with all the buildings about it. On the ground floor is an elegant hall, one of the nicest in Paris, and a gymnasium, with swimming tank, baths, bicycle and running track, and the most improved gymnasium apparatus, from an American manufactory. On the first floor are the secretaries' offices, reading, conversation rooms, rooms for boys, hall for social and religious meetings, etc. On the third floor is a cafe, which is under the care of an experienced caterer, and is open only to members of the Association. It is very complete and elegant in all of its appointments. On the top floor are rooms and apartments for young men.

The opening exercises called together a distinguished company. Monsieur Alfred Andre, Regent of the Bank of France, presided and delivered the opening address. President Carnot, prevented from being present by other engagements, sent a letter of regrets, as did Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, and the Swedish minister. Among the distinguished gentlemen on the platform were M. Bardoux, Vice-President of the Senate, M. Barbey, ex-Minister of Marines, M. Jules Siegfried, ex-Minister of Commerce, M. Leon Say, ex-Minister of Finance, M. Lefebure, Senator, Baron Millet, Baron Hottenguer, and many others. Nearly all these prominent men wore the decoration of the Legion of Honor and made a most distinguished looking company.

Mr. George Williams, of London, founder the Young Men's Christian Associations, was present, as were representatives from Lyons, Geneva and America. The leading Protestant ministers of Paris assisted. The hall was crowded to overflow, as was the building, which was open for inspection. Addresses were delivered by M. Andre, Mr. George Williams, M. Leon Say, M. Buscarlet, President of the Association, and Pastor Soutier. A letter was read from Mr. James Stokes, of New York, to whom the Association largely owes its building, regretting his inability to be present, and congratulating the Association on the possession of a building so elegant and complete in all its appointments.

The cost of the building and lot was $200,000. Of this amount, Mr. James Stokes and his family contributed $80,000, and the same amount was raised among French contributors, M. Andre giving $30,000 as the first subscription, leaving a debt of $40,000 to be provided for. The Association, before entering the building, had a membership of 700, and had a good "all-round" Association work, as active in its religious as in its other departments.

A sum of money has been raised to send poor children into the country for change of air for a week. The number that can be sent for the amount in hand will depend on how cheaply board can be secured. Letters have been sent to the Leagues in country districts explaining the project and what has been done, and asking them to aid the Newark brethren by finding places where the little ones will be welcomed and boarded at low rates. All honor to such a League and may the members be blessed in their work!——Programmes of the approaching International Conference at Cleveland have been prepared and are sold at thirty-five cents, including postage. They may be secured by addressing the Headquarters Epworth League Conference, Hollenden Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio. ——A convention was held recently at Marion, Iowa of the Leagues in the Cedar Rapids district. The report showed an encouraging increase in membership, fully eight hundred names having been added during the year. The total now is nearly 3200. The election of officers gave the Presidency to Rev. H. Slingerland of Marion and the Secretaryship to W. S. Fleming of Mount Vernon.——The fourth anniversary of the organization of the League was widely celebrated in the districts. Many of the Leagues adopted the official programme and in all of them there was an excellent display of loyalty and enthusiasm.

The Dervishes of Damascus.

They are a Peculiar Feature of Social and Religious Life in the World's Oldest City

DAMASCUS the ancient, whose wealth and commerce were famous in the earliest dawn of history, is the only great city on the globe that has not either sunk into oblivion or lost population, power and prestige in the lapse of the centuries. Almost all the ancient capitals, that were the centres of the world's activities before the Christian era, have either completely vanished or dwindled to insignificance that conveys no impression of their former glories. But the city founded by Uz, the grandson of Shem, was a capital of importance in the days of Abraham, whose faithful steward, Eleazar, was a native of that place. In the reign of David, it was the great commercial metropolis of Syria. It was a seat of learning as well as a populous centre of trade, when Paul planted Christianity there, and when the tide of battle swept across its gates during the Crusades, it was still the same beautiful and prosperous city, lying, like a richly-decked bride, among its rivers and mountains. "The Paradise of the World," it is called by the Moslems, and there is a tradition that Saladin the Conqueror, on viewing the city for the first time from the surrounding heights, was so enraptured with its loveliness that he exclaimed: "There is but one Paradise for the believer, and it lies there," pointing up to the skies. He believed that were he to enter and enjoy the earthly paradise that lay before him, he would be deprived of the bliss of the more glorious Paradise above.

One of the most interesting sections of Damascus is shown in the photograph upon this page. The great building, covering a space of several acres in extent, is the Dervicherie, in which the pilgrims sojourn while en route to Mecca. That quarter of the city in which the Dervicherie is situated is known as the Derveshiyeh, being devoted to the accommodation of the dervishes or Mohammedan monks. It is claimed that the order of dervishes existed before Mohammed. The members mostly dwell in community and live in monasteries that are called tekiehs. They are divided into three orders: the Molowijeh, or dancing dervishes; the Bodawy, or howling dervishes, and the Rufai, who make rapid motions and loud noises while at their devotions. There is a large number of subsidiary orders. When not living in the tekieh, the dervish resides with his household either in some retired part of the city, or, if he be sufficiently rich, in a suburban home, of which there are thousands around Damascus.

In the illustration below, the great mosque of the Dervicherie is seen in the background with its tall, twin minarets, from which at intervals comes the muezzin's call to prayer. To the left, is the many-domed hall or tekieh, in which the dervishes assemble for devotions and where the pilgrims are fed. Many poor are also supplied with meals from the mosque officials, as the mosque revenues, being augmented by the rentals of valuable real estate in the residence quarter of the city, are sufficent to warrant such liberality.

To the Damascus monastery come dervishes from Constantinople, Beyrout, Jerusalem, Aleppo, Smyrna, Mersina, and all parts of India, Persia, Turkey and Arabia. Especially is it crowded during the period of the great Mohammedan festival of Ramadan, and at the season of the pilgrimages. During Ramadan, the faithful Moslems fast by day and feast at night for a whole month in obedience to the Koran, and Damascus is then a scene of alternate gloom and revelry. In the evening the self-denial of the day is compensated for by indulgence in the richest food that can be procured and by a surfeit of sweet-meats, of which the Moslem ladies and children are no less fond than those of Europe and America.

A dervish, unlike most monks, is not a celibate of necessity. Indeed, the Mohammedan law permits him to have four wives. A few dervishes are wealthy, but the great majority accumulate nothing.

Not the least interesting part of the illustration is the River Barrada which flows in the immediate foreground. This is the Abana of Scripture, to which Naaman, the Syrian Captain had reference when, angered by the message of Elisha directing him to bathe seven times in the Jordan, he exclaimed: "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus better than all the waters of Israel?" The Abana is a small stream, easily fordable except in the season of melting snow. In comparison with the rivers of America, it would be esteemed a very insignificant stream indeed.

Youth in Age.

"THEY tell me I'm growing old," said the great Dr. Guthrie, "because my hair is silvered, and there are crow's feet upon my forehead, and my step is not so firm and elastic as of yore. But they are mistaken. That is not me. The brow is wrinkled, but the brow is not me. This is the house in which I live; but I am young—younger now than I ever was before."

A Mother's Legacy.

"WHAT is the meaning of this?" said a minister coming a house and taking up a tattered copy of part of the Scriptures. "I don't like to see God's Word used so;" for, indeed, the book had been torn right in two.

"O sir," said the owner of the half Bible, "don't scold till you hear how it came to be thus. That was my mother's Bible, and when she died I couldn't part with it; and we just cut it in two; and his half has been the power of God unto salvation to his soul; and my half the power of God unto salvation to mine."

What a change came over the good man's countenance after this more than satisfactory explanation! And he left, more than ever convinced that there is a mighty transforming power in God's Word.

The Joy of the House.

"THE joy of a man's house is frequently his girls," says a cheery writer in Home and Country. "They are the sunshine; when they are not there, the light is turned into darkness. It doesn't matter how many boys you have, or how proud you may justly be of them, they can't fill one girl's place. The boy is a tearing, noisy fellow; he bruises the paint, breaks the glass, and tears his clothes. It is what you expect of him when he is small, and what you have, whether you expect it or not, when he gets older; you know that he soon will be away, and like the bird will be leaving the nest as soon as his wings are grown. He will go to school, be in a store, learn a trade, or something that will take him off as a pleasure, and vex you with anxieties for his whereabouts, his habits and his welfare."

MEETING AGAIN.

WHEN for me the silent oar
Parts the silent river,
And I stand upon the shore
Of the strange For-Ever,
Shall I miss the loved and known?
Shall I vainly seek my own?

'Mid the crowd that come to meet
Spirits sin-forgiven,
Listening to their echoing feet
Down the streets of Heaven—
Shall I know a footstep near
That I listen, wait for, here?

Can the bounds that make us here
Know ourselves immortal,
Drop away like foliage sere
At life's inner portal?
What is holiest below
Must forever live and grow.

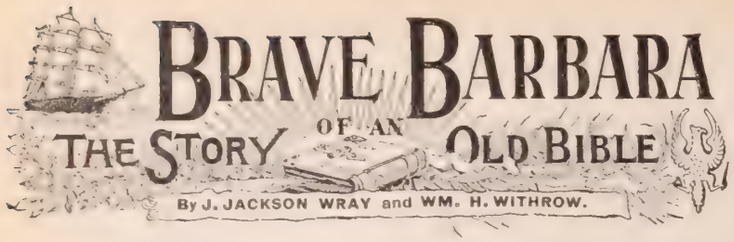
THE HOUSEKEEPER'S TRIALS.

THERE is grace needed for the pantry. Somehow cups and glasses and cake-baskets will get broken, and no one has done it. Knives will disappear, and no one has taken them. An old saucer that was given to your grandmother the day of her marriage is cracked and set back on the shelf as though it had been uninjured. The tea-caddy has been despoiled, or flour has unreasonably failed, with no miracle, as in Zarephath, to replenish it. There are but few women who can keep their temper when their best china set gets broken. To study economy for a month, and to find the result of this unusual carefulness has leaked out at some mysterious spigot; to have a whole mess of milk soured by one thunder-storm; to have the wash-boiler boil over and put out the fire; to have the dessert only half done when the people at dinner are waiting, wondering whether it is to be sago pudding or Narcissus blanc-mange; to have the servant make up her mind she didn't like the place, and leave the house in the midst of the ironing; to have to provide elaborate entertainment for some one whom you asked to come to your house without any idea she would accept the invitation; to find after the quinces are all peeled and cut that the brass kettle has been borrowed,—all this demands grace for the kitchen.

Let no housekeeper, therefore, despise her occupation, but rather pray for grace to fulfil her mission. The toils and fatigues and vexations of such a sphere may be unappreciated by husbands and fathers and mothers, but God knows and sympathizes.

If, according to the Bible we prize so much, God puts into a bottle his people's tears, he will count the number of sweat-drops on your forehead while bending over the stove in midsummer solstice. By the potential way in which you perform your duties you may make the rolling-pin a sceptre. Be faithful! There will be a grand supper after a while, for the preparation of which you will have no anxiety. It will be the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, and you will be one of the banqueters at that heavenly festivity.



CHAPTER XIV.

THE QUAKER REFUGEES

THE second or third year after the settlement of our little band of Palatine Methodists on the Canadian bank of the St. Lawrence, they received a very noteworthy addition to their numbers. Towards the close of a sunny day in May, the snowy sails of two large bateaux were seen rounding the bluff headland that shut off from view the lower reaches of the river. The unusual and exciting sight brought together the whole population of the little hamlet, and when the barges made for the shore, the curious inhabitants were on the beach to give the newcomers a hearty welcome. It was the first event of the kind which had happened since their arrival to take possession of the land.

In the bow of the foremost boat stood quite a distinguished figure; a venerable-looking man, with snowy beard and a wealth of hair which may be described as iron-grey. The latter fell in lengthy locks on his broad shoulders, and imparted a patriarchal appearance to its wearer. He wore also a low-crowned, broad-brimmed hat, a brownish coat with straight collar and "cutaway" skirt. A number of younger men impelled the bateaux through the waters, and the way they handled their oars gave token of muscle and skill. They all wore the same peculiar costume as their leader, and all bore the same grave look upon their faces, faces which told of birth and breeding, and gave promise that their owners were of "the stuff of which the best emigrants are made."

The women of the party—there were five or six of them—of different ages, wore comfortable brown stuff gowns, and deep, drab-colored "poke" bonnets; but these quite innocent of bow or ribbon, save the strings with which they were tied. Even the children, who made an attractive addition to the party, wore a garb almost as plain, and quite as old-fashioned and distinctive as their elders, and the entire group were evidently Quakers of the most orthodox type.

Beckoning with his hand to the friendly group who stood upon the shore, the elderly leader of the newcomers said as the keel of the well-laden barges grated on the shore: "Peace be to this place and to all that dwell therein."

"We bid you welcome in the name of the Lord." The response came from the lips of Brave Barbara, whom the villagers recognized as the head and chief of their small community. She extended her hands in hearty greeting, and a general exclamation from stream and shore sealed the friendly greeting. The younger men took hold of the bateaux, and with the aid of Philip Embury and his comrades, dragged them up on the beach, and assisted the party to disembark.

"We have been moved to seek new homes here," said the old gentleman, "and to cast in our lot with the subjects of our king."

"Fain and glad are we to see you," said Paul Heck, who was delighted at this evidence of the love for peace which had brought the newcomers there. "A goodly heritage is this fertile land—a land, which like Canaan of old, floweth with milk and honey."

The old man smiled as he made ready reply: "We desire no goodlier land than that we left on the banks of the Schuylkill, where we and our fathers sojourned since the days of William Penn. But we desire to dwell in a land of peace, where we shall never hear again the brute, nor feel the bruisings of war."

"We are of the same mind as that," cried the delighted Paul, giving the speaker a warm hand-shake on his own account. "Come and bide this night with us: you and your family. To-morrow we will find the allotment appointed for you; it must be a little higher up the river."

"Thanks to thee, good friend, for thy hospitality," was the hearty response. "This is [illegible] producing a silver-haired old lady of sweet and kindly countenance; "and these," he added, waving his hand towards the younger groups, "are my sons and my sons' wives and their little ones. The Lord hath dealt bountifully with me, as with his servant Jacob. It was borne upon me to seek a home in this northern land. If the Lord prosper us, our kinsfolk in Pennsylvania will shortly follow us."

"You belong, I see, to the people called Quakers," said Paul, as he led the way to the homestead which was to be their temporary resting-place. "For them I have a great and true regard, for their peace principles are strong and thorough-going, like my own."

"The people of the world call us 'Quakers,'" said Josiah Whiteside—for such was his name. "It was given us in derision and scorn; but I, for one, resent not the word, though some of our people prefer the name of 'Friends.'"

"And very good friends we shall be, I sincerely hope and believe," said Paul, with an emphatic nod. "I will use the name you like best."

"Nay, nay," said Josiah, quietly and brightly; "to my mind it is but a small matter. 'Friends' is a name that, if God will, shall bide with us as a sign of our conduct and spirit; and quaking hath but little to do with those who hold by Yea and Nay. But the word of reproach is a word of honor, and hath lessons for faithful hearts that we shall do well to remember."

The guests were ushered into the large living room of the Heck family. There Barbara was in waiting to receive them.

"Peace be upon this house!" exclaimed Josiah, with lifted hands; and somehow there seemed to be a real benediction in the words. When Barbara replied, "We wish you peace in the name of the Lord," it was felt on all hands that the welcome was complete, and that the roof of the log cabin held beneath its rafters members of the same household of faith.

Of course, the mistress of the house gave her special attention to the Quakeress with the silver hair.

"Dear heart," she said, as she relieved Hannah of her bonnet and cloak, "you must be wearied with your long journey. I have known somewhat of long journeyings both river, sea, and land. But the company of those we love, and the gracious company of him that loves us, takes a good deal of the 'tire' out, doesn't it?"

"Of a truth, it is as thou sayest," said the elder woman, with a smile and a glow that told of the sweet secret they held in common, and when the journey is of the Lord's planning, "and they that go thereon have only truth, and right and duty as the aim they seek, they have good hope to prosper as they go and to find 'home' at the end."

"Ay, marry!" said Barbara, whose heart was touched by these good words. "And now you are at home, even as if it were your own."

"It's more than makes amends for the toilsome travel," said Hannah, "to get such kindly greeting and peaceful shelter, where we expected to meet nothing but red men and red deer. What is thy name?"

"Barbara Heck, and my good man's name is Paul," was the reply.

"We who are of the Friends' persuasion have little to do with the world's names and titles, said the soft-voiced Hannah, laying her hand in that of her new found friend. Be not offended if I call thy husband, Friend Paul, and thyself Barbara; and, I prithee, call me Hannah. It will seem more home-like in this far-off place."

And so the covenant was made between them both. These two became fast and abiding friends. They had much in common—the same unworldly and spiritual nature; the same habitual communion with the Unseen; the same happy shining of the inner light. There was greater mental vigor in Barbara, greater force of character, stronger powers of asserting herself where conviction had to be maintained, God's message to be declared, and duty had to be done at any cost. In these respects she was as Deborah; and Hannah as the quiet Mary, but both were as one in sitting at Jesus' feet.

Those who knew them both have told us how pleasant it was to see Hannah Whiteside, with her smooth and placid brow, almost unwrinkled by a line of care, listening to the [illegible] Barbara, in whose wealth of auburn hair the silver threads had begun to appear. Not less noteworthy was it to observe how Barbara sat in turn at the feet of the calm and godly Quakeress listening to the sweet lore of practical experience unfolded to her out of the secret heart that knew so much of Jesus.

The children and some of the elder women were comfortably lodged in the spacious attic of the Hecks' abode. The young men were housed with the Lawrences, so far as space was available, and with Philip Embury, who had lately reared a brand-new habitation in readiness to receive his bride, when the set time should come. It mattered little to the young and hardy Quakers that, as yet, their bedding was a plentiful supply of dry straw from the well-filled barns.

The Methodist settlement, as it had come to be called, found in the new Quaker settlement, which was now established some two miles up the river, a pleasant neighbor, and the best of good fellowship marked the relations between the two. The sense of isolation which had hitherto been so oppressively felt by our Palatine pioneers was now lifted and, as Barbara put it, "they had now somebody to say 'Amen' to their prayers; somebody to weep with them in their sorrows, and somebody, when their hearts were joyful to help them to sing, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'"

In the course of another year or so, another company arrived upon the scene. The newcomers added still greater variety to the little forest community. They consisted of two or three families from the State of Virginia, families of wealth and position who had clung to English rule through the Revolution, and had received liberal grants of land in Upper Canada by way of reward.

The leading member of this new company of Virginian loyalists was Colonel Issac Pemberton, a portly personage, who was remarkable for great dignity of bearing and the unstudied politeness of the gentleman. He had served on the staff of Lord Cornwallis in the Royalist Army, and on this account he was always known as "Colonel Pemberton," although he had done with all things military for evermore. His sons had also served in the king's army, but only in the capacity of "full privates." By the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, the Pembertons became prisoners of war, but after being released on parole, they were again free men.

The vast Pemberton estate on the Upper Potomac, yielding a rich annual revenue in tobacco and grain, together with the stately mansion, in which the gallant Colonel used to dispense an open-handed Virginian hospitality was confiscated by the revolutionists. He had managed, however, to secure a considerable amount of ready money, together with the valuable jewels of his wife and daughters. These latter included an article held by the family in no small honor—a necklace which had been presented to the Colonel's mother, on her wedding-day, by Queen Anne, in recognition of her services as one of her maids of honor. It will be seen, therefore, that quite an aristocratic blend had come into the social life of New Ballygran and its vicinity.

Of course, the large troop of slaves on the Pemberton estate were all confiscated, too. But through some oversight, two old and favorite servants of the family were permitted to share the fallen fortunes of their master. This the faithful Negroes gladly did, for they felt that upon their labors and fidelity, the dignity and honor of the house depended. And so it came to pass that the valet and the butler, together with their wives and children joined in the immigration to the Colonel's new home in Ontario.

These two sable servitors rejoiced in the names of Julius Cæsar and Pompey; but they were for the most part addressed as "You Jule" or "You Pomp," as the case might be. The Colonel, however, generally called them "Uncle Pomp" and "Uncle Jule," and as they grew in years this came to be their popular cognomen.

More important even than these worthies, as members of the Pemberton household, and equally faithful in sharing the fallen fortunes of their owners were the wives of the classic heroes. "Mammy" Dinah, the ancient nurse of the younger Pembertons, and Aunt Chloe, the oracle and priestess of the kitchen, who had presided over that department in the palmy days of lavish hospitality—these were important members of the household, the whole party, whose fortunes, the story of Brave Barbara compels us to follow, took passage in a schooner down the Potomac. At Hampton Roads they were transferred to a British ship sent to convey them to Halifax in the province of Nova Scotia. It was a small and crowded vessel; and the autumnal equinox had brought with it fierce Atlantic gales. Three weeks they beat about that stern inhospitable coast. They suffered severe privations, and at least twice had nearly suffered shipwreck. At last, weary, worn and half dead, they were able to enter the port; their battered ship with tattered canvas and bruised keel, glided like a storm-tossed bird on weary wing, into the harbor of Halifax.

There was no fair city, with spacious streets and squares such as we behold to-day; only a row of wooden warehouses, and on the rising slope, irregular groups of houses made of wood and shingle, barracks and a fort; all surrounded by a strong palisade. But in the noble bay, lay slumbering half a score of ships. When the bruised and battered bark that bore our Virginian emigrants entered the harbor, the lightning flashed from the oaken sides of the war-ships, and the thunder rolled over the wave as the refugees received a salute of welcome. Our exiles, for conscience' sake felt a proud thrill of satisfaction that they were once more under the protection of the old flag for which they had endured so bravely and so long.

It was on the verge of winter. Many of the refugees were suffering from lack of clothing, and many were without means to provide either food or shelter. Many of them were of gentle birth. There were judges, officers of the army, clergymen of Oxford training, planters and country gentlemen, all reduced from competence to poverty. The best provision that was possible was made for their comfort by the good folks of Halifax. The king's stores were thrown open; ample supplies of food, tents, blankets, etc., were furnished, and every door was opened to provide warmth and shelter for the exiles.

Some of them took up land in Nova Scotia, and their posterity are to be found in honor and social service in that vigorous colony to-day. Colonel Pemberton and his family at once pressed forward on their way to the distant Canadian wilds. The severe winter held them fast, however, in camp and barrack until the ice door was unlocked, and then a transport was sent up the river St. Lawrence, to carry our weary travelers to Montreal.

But the spring was late, and the journey arduous and long. Ice-floes were numerous, and dangerous, by reason of their size; but the troubles of our refugees were nearly at an end. The negroes and negresses who had suffered intensely during this bitter experience, so new and strange to the warm-blooded "children of the sun," began to laugh and sing like children as they felt the warm glow of returning spring. The month of May saw them within hail of Mount Royal. A green flush overspread the landscape. The air was filled with the pollen and catkin of larch and willow, and nature was fast donning her holiday attire. When our travelers landed at Montreal, and made their rapid way to "The Heck Settlement," as the home of our own special pioneers had come to be called, the blue-eyed violets were blooming under the very shadow of the "ice-shove," where the ice-floes had broken into "chunks," and piled themselves here and there along the shore; and long before the snow-drifts had melted from the hollows, a whiter drift of apple-blossoms had covered, as with a bridal veil, the orchard trees.

The welcome which greeted these Virginian Loyalists, was no less cordial than had been that of the more peaceful and less aristocratic Quakers of the previous year. Irish peasant, Pennsylvania farmer, Virginian aristocrat and planter—all had suffered in a common cause, and community of suffering had bound them in a common bond.

It was a remarkably romantic and picturesque patch of social life, that which was then being developed in and around the thriving centre of New Ballygran. Nobody, I think, can study it without marveling how "God fulfils himself" and moulds all forces, all events to the working out of his plan and purpose, the moral and social uplifting of our race, the lever being, all the while and only, the simple Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and its force and beauty as seen in the loving hearts and faithful lives of men.

Here in the Heck settlement, so strangely brought into existence, we see as the undoubted centre, the loving Barbara, a simple peasant woman from the poor and homely hearthstone of a little Irish farm. Around her, here in the heart of the virgin wilderness are gathered her Irish comrades, including the once forlorn and ragged heathen waif whom she had reclaimed; the Red Indians, Tookalusca and Ooloona, both of whom had been drawn there by the Magnet of Calvary. The honest and earnest Quaker household, with its steady light lit from the same central flame; the simple cluster of negroes, the elder of whom knew something of Jesus, and the military and aristocratic group of Virginians—all destined to revolve for awhile around the life and light of Brave Barbara, as around a central sun.

A CONGO NEW TESTAMENT.

The Congo New Testament is being printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society for the Baptist Missionary Society. The Independent says that a compromise was made between the two societies as to the word for baptism. The Congo word for immerse is in the text; but is followed by the word "baptize" in brackets. Negotiations are being made on the same basis for the printing of the Oriya version.

Suffered Every Minute

Since I came out of the war, with catarrh in my head, chronic diarrhœa and rheumatism," says Mr. J. G. Anderson, a well known blacksmith in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Scottdale, Pa. "I had pains all over me, my sight was dim, and there seemed to be floating-specks before my eyes. The food I ate seemed like lead in my stomach. The rheumatism was in my right hip and shoulders. Hood's Sarsaparilla and Hood's Pills did me more good than everything else put together. They are the only medicines I use now. All my disagreeable symptoms have gone."

Joshua's Long Day.*

As to the miracle of the sun and moon standing still, there has been much disputation. It is well known that this was one of the passages brought forward by the Church of Rome to condemn Galileo, when he affirmed that the earth and the moon revolved around the sun, and that it was not the motion of the sun around the earth, but the rotation of the earth on her own axis that produced the change of day and night. No one would dream now of making use of this passage for any such purpose. Whatever theory of inspiration men may hold, it is admitted universally that the inspired writers used the popular language of the day in matters of science, and did not anticipate discoveries which were not made till many centuries later. That expressions occur in Scripture which are not in accord with the established conclusions of modern science would never be regarded by any intelligent person as an argument against the Scriptures as the inspired records of God's will, designed especially to reveal to us the way of life and salvation through Jesus Christ, and to be an infallible guide to us on all that "man is to believe concerning God, and the duty that God requires of man."

A far more serious question has been raised as to whether this miracle ever occurred, or could have occurred. To those who believe in the possibility of miracles, it can be no conclusive argument that it could not have occurred without producing injurious consequences the end of which can hardly be conceived. For if the rotation of the earth on its axis was suddenly arrested, all human beings on its surface, and all loose objects whatever must have been flung forward with prodigious violence; jnst as on a small scale, on the sudden stoppage of a carriage, we find ourselves thrown forward, the motion of the carriage having been communicated to our bodies. But really this is a paltry objection; for surely the divine power which can control the motion of the earth is abundantly able to obviate such effects as these. We can understand the objection that God, having adjusted all the forces of nature, leaves them to operate by themselves in a uniform way without disturbance or interference; but we can hardly comprehend the reasonableness of the position that if it is his pleasure miraculously to modify one arrangement, he is unable to adjust all relative arrangements, and make all conspire harmoniously to the end desired. . . . There are commentators worthy of high respect who have thought that the fact of this incident being noticed in the form of a quotation from "the Book of Jasher" somewhat diminishes the credit due to it. It looks as if it had not formed part of the original narrative, but had been inserted by a subsequent editor from a book of poetry, expressed with poetic license and perhaps of later date. They are disposed to regard the words of Joshua, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou moon in the valley of Ajalon," as a mere expression of his desire that the light would last long enough to allow the decisive work of the day to be brought to a thorough conclusion. . . But whatever allowance we may make for the poetic license of speech, it is hardly possibly not to perceive that the words as they stand imply a miracle of extraordinary sublimity; nor do we see any sufficient ground for resisting the common belief that in whatsoever way it was effected, there was a supernatural extension of the period of light, to allow Joshua to finish his work.

THE OLD MEETING-HOUSE.†

The old meeting-house had been greatly altered within the last few years, much to Miss Lucinda's sorrow. The old-fashioned three-decker pulpit, with its curious sounding-board, had been pulled down, and there had been a new organ put in, "to keep the young people," to use a popular phrase.

Miss Lucinda could remember the time when they had no organ, but a violin, bass-viol, and a tuning-fork, and a solemn-looking man in a coat of shiny broadcloth to pompously beat time; when the sermons were nearly three hours long, and delivered with that conscientious but terrifying earnestness which characterized the divines of that time. Those were the days when most of the congregation sat bolt upright, stiff and starched in their Sunday clothes, until the last hymn, when they all, with one accord, rose to their feet, turned their backs on the minister, and faced the choir with unction. A curious piece of ritualism, by the way, which, if done in some contemporaneous Episcopal church, would have been supposed to savor too much of popish form and ceremony. Nowadays, all these things had gone out with the old-time preaching, which, though it may have made some self-righteous, had also created its men of steel, of strength and fibre, and of courage, —the courage which comes of strong conviction.

A CHURCH SOCIABLE.*

John Jessig opened his house every Wednesday evening for general conversation on religious subjects. Tea and coffee as auxiliaries to religion have been greatly underestimated. The aroma of these genial beverages dissipates the frigid stateliness of such occasions, and exerts a very neighborly if not a distinctly evangelical influence. Two men who are reasonably well acquainted will sit stiffly side by side for a full hour, as though they were a couple of icicles, or as though they were participants in a family feud, not knowing how to begin a conversation, or perhaps with no desire to begin one. The cunning magic of a cup of coffee changes their thoughts and feelings in an instant, loosens their tongues by some unaccountable legerdemain, and starts them on a dozen topics in a dozen minutes.

Every clergyman knows that the simplest kind of refreshments work wonders. Invisible barriers tumble to invisible ground, and the chill air gives way to something almost tropical. Whether it is that the spiritual life is distantly or indirectly related to the digestive organs, I have never been able to discover. I merely relate facts, and leave the philosophy which underlies them to abler and more curious minds.

Young people especially are always in a state of chronic hunger. They attend a sociable in the vestry, which has no kitchen attached, in the spiritual condition indicated by wraps and furs; but the sociability engendered in a meeting which offers even the humble sandwich is as tempting as a flower garden. The ice of formality melts, and religion joins hands with general good feeling when the coffee-pot hums its little song.

John Jessig had learned this secret from the aged ex-pastor, who in turn had learned it by repeated experiment. From seven o'clock to eight on this particular evening he had suggested a variety of topics—the church debt, the feasibility of holding a fair to pay off the mortgage, and the best means of reaching the unchurched of Woodbine; but no one ventured to break silence except Deacon Northwind, who droned in his usual way and got all his verbs tangled in the meshes of his adjectives, and one other individual, who spoke so low that he could hardly hear his own voice. It was an iceberg hour, and John felt the cold chills creeping over him.

But after the table had been cleared away it seemed as though everybody wanted to talk at once. Sisters and brethren were alike so full of opinions that they could hardly contain themselves. Faces wore an entirely different expression, and tongues which had suffered from paralysis suddenly started into activity. The meeting from that moment was not merely lively, but effervescent, and John recognized gratefully the benign influence of the coffee berry and the tea plant.

THE OLD PREACHER'S HYMN.

(The Bible.)

MY Book! my Book! my grand old Book!
By inspiration given;
Thy every page from age to age
Reveals the way to Heaven.

My Lamp of Light, in nature's night,
Thy unbeclouded ray,
Has turned the gloom of death and tomb
To everlasting day.

My Chart! my Chart! my changeless Chart
By thee I guide my bark.
A sinner vile on ocean wild,
O'er mountain billows dark.

By thee I steer in safe career
With canvass all unfurled;
And onward sail before the gale
To yonder blissful world.

My staff! my staff! my trusty staff!
I'll grasp thee in my hand,
As faint and weak on Pisgah's peak
I view the promised land.

Not sadly told as one of old
To see but not explore,
My hold I'll keep through Jordan's deep
Till safe on Canaan's shore.

My Sword! my Sword! my two-edged Sword!
By thy unerring might,
I deal my foe the deadly blow
In faith's unequal fight.

My Book! my Book! my grand old Book!
Heaven speed thee on thy way;
From pole to pole as ages roll
The harbinger of day.

Till Christ the Light, shall banish night
From this terrestrial ball,
And earth shall see her jubilee,
And God be all in all.

—Author "UNKNOWN."

A JAPANESE IDEA OF HEAVEN.

No country in the world does more to entertain its children than Japan, says Miss White, a missionary lady who has spent some time in that country. Even on the street corners men stand whose sole business it is to tell stories to the boys and girls. One day she joined a group of little folks who were eagerly listening, and this is what she heard: "Once upon a time a peasant went to heaven, and the first thing he saw was a long shelf with something very strange-looking upon it. 'What is that?' he asked; 'is that something to make soup of?' (The Japanese are very fond of soup). 'No,' was the reply; 'those are ears. They belonged to persons who, when they lived on earth, heard what they ought to do in order to be good, but they did not pay any attention to it, so when they died their ears came to heaven, but the rest of their bodies could not." After awhile the peasant saw another shelf with very queer things on it. 'What is that,' he asked again; 'is that something to make soup of?' 'No,' he was told; 'those are tongues. They once belonged to men in the world who told people how to live and how to do good, but they themselves never did as they told others to do; so, when they died, their tongues came to heaven, but the rest of their bodies could not.' This is only a heathen idea of the beautiful land on high, but God says in his word some things which are very much like the morals of this Japanese story. The difference between hearing the the Word of God and doing it, is told us in the words of our Lord Jesus Christ in the story of the man who built his house on the sand and the other who built his upon a rock."

VALUE OF SABBATH OBSERVANCE

IN the course of a recent debate on industrial questions in the French Chamber of Deputies, Louis Blanc strongly advocated Sunday observance, claiming that the productions of the nation would not be diminished by closing all the works and factories on one day of the week. He stated as a fact that the average weekly production of each working man was greater in England than in France, though the French mechanic worked seventy-two hours and the English fifty-six. He attributed the anomaly to the fact that the natural forces of the English mechanic were better husbanded through having a weekly rest. Business men who make their employees work on the Sabbath do it that they may make money. When a man sets his heart on money as the highest good he has to be on his guard let he lose his reverence for all else and sacrifice greater and better things to get it. Agassiz was asked why a man of so great ability as he was content with so small an income. He replied, "I have sufficient for my need. I do not want more. I suppose I could make more money but I have not time. Life is too short for a man to get rich and do his duty to his fellows, too."

ROBED IN RIGHTEOUSNESS.

AT one of the Paris stations of the McAll Mission, an aged woman, who had learned by heart many of the hymns, and seemed to find all her delight in them, came to the meeting leaning on a crutch, and evidently very feeble. The subject of discourse that night was "Dress"—the robe of righteousness, the wedding-garment. At the close she said to the preacher, "I believe this is my last visit to the hall; if I can never come again, you will know where I have gone. My infirmities increase rapidly." "I will come to see you," said the preacher; "but if God called you meanwhile, have you any fear of appearing before him?" "Oh, no," she replied, "I am too well dressed for that—too well dressed to dread the judgment. He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness." Thus the poor, aged Frenchwoman felt the truth of the hymn:

Jesus, Thy blood and right-ousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress;
'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

This is essentially the age of progress, and in no branch of human ingenuity has this been more marked than in the mechanical department of the newspaper press. The old regime of clumsy, inartistic type and conventional "make-up" is passing away. One of the pioneers in the new and improved order of things is, singularly enough, the oldest newspaper in New York, the venerable Commercial Advertiser, which is now in its ninety-fifth year. It has celebrated the middle year of its tenth decade of existence by putting on a very handsome dress of artistic type, and in otherwise improving the appearance of the paper, which now stands among the leading journals in the metropolis in opinion and influence. It is to the credit of the Commercial Advertiser that it has always been a clean newspaper, fit to be read in the house, and doubtless much of its present popularity is due to this fact, as well as to its marked enterprise in typographical art.

A Gospel for Red and Black.

Twenty-Two Years' Work among the Indians and Negroes at the Hampton Institute, Virginia—Gen. Armstrong's Noble Career of Self-Sacrifice and its Fruits.

NOT every soldier who is valiant in the field is a hero. Something more than physical courage is essential to the character of the true warrior. This added quality was found in such men as General Havelock, the Christian hero of the Indian mutiny, in Hedley Vicars, in Chinese Gordon, and in the indomitable Stonewall Jackson. In still later years, it has been grandly exemplified in the career of such men as Gen. O. O. Howard the "Friend of the Freedman," and Gen. S. C. Armstrong, whose whole life, military and civic, up to the day of his death a few weeks ago, was an unbroken record of devotion to the cause of Christian philanthropy.

INDIAN YOUTHS, AS THEY COME TO THE INSTITUTE.

Samuel Chapman Armstrong was born fifty-four years ago in the Sandwich Islands, his parents having been natives of this country. His father, Rev. Richard Armstrong of Pennsylvania, was one of the earliest missionaries sent out by the Presbyterian Church to the Sandwich Islands. In 1847 he was appointed Minister of Public Instruction and established a large number of free schools in Hawaii, continuing the educational movement until his death in 1860. Samuel, his son, left that country in his twenty-first year to attend college in Massachusetts he having received his preliminary training in Oahu College, Honolulu. On completing his education he entered the army, and bore himself gallantly throughout the war, taking part in a number of engagements and earning high promotion. At the close of hostilities he was appointed a Brigadier-General and mustered out of the service.

While in the army, he had several years' experience with negro soldiers, and became convinced of the excellent qualities and capabilities of the freedmen. In 1866, he was placed by Gen. O. O. Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, in charge of ten counties in Eastern Virginia, with headquarters at Hampton, which had been the great "contraband" camp, and where it became his duty to manage affairs and adjust, if possible, the relations of the races. It was a difficult problem that now confronted the young Christian soldier. Every three months, he personally visited and reported on the condition of the ten counties, to which there had been a large influx of population. There were no civil courts and the military court at Hampton was the tribunal before which all difficulties were adjusted. Between the years 1865 and 1870, a marvelous change took place in the prospects of the lately-enslaved colored race. The Freedmen's Bureau which had given a national impulse to the cause of the recently emancipated negro, appropriated $3,500,000 for the erection of negro school houses and other educational institutions and for the payment of teachers. Of this amount $50,000 was set aside as the nucleus of a fund for the erection of educational buildings at Hampton, Va. From this comparatively small beginning, under Gen. Armstrong's thorough and conscientious management, the work there rapidly broadened and expanded to such an extent that Hampton became the leading centre of education for the colored race in America. Gen. Armstrong devoted his life and consecrated his entire energies to building up these institutions. At first only negroes were taught, but subsequently Indians were included among the students. Gen. Armstrong tells in his own graphic language how he found affairs at Hampton when he took charge.

"I found an active, excellent educational work going on under the American Missionary Association of New York, which, in 1862, had opened, in the vicinity, the first school for freedmen in the South, in charge of an ex-slave, Mrs. Mary Peake. Over fifteen hundred children were gathering daily; some in old hospital barracks. Close at hand, the pioneer settlers of America and the first slaves landed on this continent; here Powhatan reigned; here the Indian was first met; here the first Indian child was baptized; here freedom was first given the slave by Gen. Butler's famous "contraband" order; in sight of this shore, the battle of the Monitor and Merrimac saved the Union and revolutionized naval warfare; here Gen. Grant based the operations of his final campaign. The place was easily accessible by railroad and water routes to the North, and to a population of two millions of negroes. I soon felt the fitness of this historic and strategic spot for a permanent and great educational work. The suggestion was cordially received by the American Missionary Association, which authorized the purchase, in June, 1867, of 'Little Scotland,' an estate of 125 acres (since increased to 190), on the Hampton River, looking out over Hampton Roads. I was surprised, one day, by a letter from Secretary E. P. Smith, of the A. M. A., stating that the man selected for the place had declined, and asking me if I could take it. I replied, 'Yes.' Till then my own future had been blind; it had only been clear that there was a work to do for the ex-slaves.

THE LATE GENERAL SAMUEL C. ARMSTRONG.
(Founder and Originator of Hampton Institute)

"The thing to be done was clear: to train selected negro youth who should go out and teach and lead their people, first by example, by getting land and homes; to give them not a dollar that they could earn for themselves; to teach respect for labor, to replace stupid drudgery with skilled hands; and, to these ends, to build up an industrial system, for the sake not only of self-support and intelligent labor, but also for the sake of character. And it seemed equally clear that the people of the country would support a wise work for the freedmen." This was the genesis of the Hampton Institute, one of the greatest blessings ever conferred upon the colored race in America. From the first, the idea was education by self-help. Nothing was asked for the student that he could possibly provide by his own labor. From a mere handful of students, the school grew until now its roll shows 650 boarding students from 24 States and Territories, averaging eighteen years of age, and 136 of them being Indians. There are, besides, occasional representatives of other races, including Afro-Cuban, Russian, native African, Armenian, Persian, Chinese, Japanese, Australian and Hawaiian. To control, direct, and instruct this large number, there are eighty officers, teachers and assistants. The schools (which are shown in the illustration on this page), are

The Tabernacle Pulpit

GRAPES FROM CANAAN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Num. 13:23, "And they came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two upon a staff."

THE long trudge of the Israelites across the wilderness was almost ended. They had come to the borders of the promised land. Of the six hundred thousand adults who started from Egypt for Canaan, how many do you suppose got there? Five hundred thousand? Oh, no. Not two hundred thousand, not one hundred thousand, nor fifty, nor twenty, nor ten; but only two men. Oh, it was a ruinous march that God's people made; but their children were living and they were on the march, and now that they had come up to the borders of the promised land, they were very curious to know what kind of a place it was, and whether it would be safe to go over. So a scouting party is sent out to reconnoitre, and they examine the land, and they come back bringing specimens of its growths. Just as you came back from California, bringing to your family a basket of pears, or plums, or apples, to show what monstrous fruit they have there, so this scouting party cut off the biggest bunch of grapes they could find. It was so large that one man could not carry it, and they thrust a pole through the cluster, and there was one man at either end of the pole, and so the bunch of grapes was transported. I was, some time ago, in a luxuriant vineyard. The vine-dresser had done his work. The vine had clambered up and spread its wealth all over the arbor. The sun and shower had mixed a cup which the vine drank until with flushed cheek it lay slumbering in the light, cluster against the cheek of cluster. The rinds of the grapes seemed almost bursting with the juice in the warm lips of the autumnal day, and it seemed as if all you had to do was to lift a chalice towards the cluster and its life-blood would begin to drip away. But, my friends, in these rigorous climes we know nothing about large grapes. Strabo states that in Bible times and in Bible lands there were grape-vines so large that it took two men with outstretched arms to reach round them, and he says there were clusters two cubits in length, or twice the length from the elbow to the tip of the long finger. And Achaicus, dwelling in those lands, tells us that during the time he was smitten with fever one grape would slake his thirst for the whole day. No wonder, then, in these Bible times two men thought it worth their while to put their strength together to carry down one cluster of grapes from the promised land.

But this morning I bring you a larger cluster of hopes, a cluster of prospects, a cluster of Christian consolations; and I am expecting that one taste of it will rouse up your appetite for the heavenly Canaan. During the past winter some of this congregation have gone away never to return. The aged have put down their staff and taken up the sceptre. Men in mid-life came home from office or shop, and did not go back again, and never will go back again. And the dear children, some of them, have been gathered in Christ's arms. He found this world too rough a place for them, and so he has gathered them in. And oh, how many wounded souls there are—wounds for which this world offers no medicament, and unless from the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ there shall come a consolation, there will be no consolation at all. Oh, that the God of all comfort would help me while I preach, and that the God of all comfort would help you while you hear.

First, I console you with the divinely sanctioned idea that your departed friends are as much yours now as they ever were. I know you sometimes get the idea in your mind, when you have this kind of trouble, that your friends are cut off from you, and they are no longer yours; but the desire to have all our loved ones in the same lot in the cemetery is a natural desire, a universal desire, and, therefore, a God-implanted desire, and is mightily suggestive of the fact that death has no power to break up the family relations. If our loved ones go away from our possession, why put a fence around our lot in the cemetery? Why the gathering of four or five names on one family monument? Why the planting of one cypress-vine so that it covers all the cluster of graves? Why put the husband beside the wife, and the children at their feet? Why the bolt on the gate of our lot, and the charge to the keepers of the ground to see that the grass is cut, and the vine attended to, and the flowers planted? Why not put our departed friends in one common field or grave? Oh, it is because they are ours. That child, O stricken mother! is as much yours this morning as in the solemn hour when God put it against your heart, and said as of old: "Take this child and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages." It is no mere whim. It is a divinely-planted principle in the soul, and God certainly would not plant a lie, and he would not culture a lie! Abraham would not allow Sarah to be buried in a stranger's grounds, although some very beautiful ground was offered him a free gift; but he pays four hundred shekels for Machpelah, the cave, and the trees overshadowing it. The grave has been well kept, and to-day the Christian traveller stands in thoughtful and admiring mood, gazing upon Machpelah, where Abraham and Sarah are taking their long sleep of four thousand years. Your father may be slumbering under the tinkling of the bell of the Scotch kirk. Your brother may have gone down in the ship that foundered off Cape Hatteras. Your little child may be sleeping on the verge of the flowering western prairie; yet God will gather them all up, however widely the dust may be scattered. Nevertheless, it is pleasant to think that we will be buried together. When my father died, and we took him out and put him down in the graveyard of Somerville, it did not seem so sad to leave him there, because right beside him was my dear, good, old, beautiful, Christian mother, and it seemed as if she said: "I was tired, and I came to bed a little early. I am glad you have come; it seems as of old." Oh, it is a consolation to feel that when men come, and with solemn tread carry you out to your resting-place, they will open the gate through which some of your friends have already gone, and through which many of your friends will follow. Sleeping under the same roof, at last sleeping under the same sod. The autumnal leaves that drift across your grave will drift across theirs; the bird-songs that drop on their mound will drop on yours; and then, in starless winter nights, when the wind comes howling through the gorge, you will be company for each other. The child close up to the bosom of its mother. The husband and wife re-married; on their lips the sacrament of the dust. Brothers and sisters, who used in sport to fling themselves on the grass, now again reclining side by side in the grave, in flecks of sunlight sifting through the long, lithe willows. Then at the trumpet of the archangel to rise side by side, shaking themselves from the dust of ages. The faces that were ghastly and fixed when you saw them last all aflush with the light of incorruption. The father looking around on his children, and saying: "Come, come, my darlings, this is the morning of the resurrection." Mrs. Sigourney wrote beautifully with the tears and blood of her own broken heart:

There was a shaded chamber,
A silent, watching band,
On a low couch a suffering child
Grasping her mother's hand.
But mid the gasp and struggle,
With shuddering lips she cried,
"Mother, oh, dearest mother,
Bury me by your side."
Only one wish she uttered,
As life was ebbing fast,
"Sleep by my side, dear mother,
And rise with me at last."

Oh, yes, we want to be buried together. Sweet antetype of everlasting residence in each other's companionship.

When the wrecker went down into the cabin of the lost steamer, he found the mother and child in each other's arms. It was sad, but it was beautiful, and it was appropriate. Together they went down. Together they will rise. One on earth. One in heaven. Is there not something cheering in all this thought, and something to impress upon us the idea that the departed are ours yet—ours forever?

But I console you again with the fact of your present acquaintanceship and communication with your departed friends. I have no sympathy, I need not say, with the ideas of modern spiritualism; but what I mean is the theory set forth by the apostle, when he says: "We are surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses." Just as in the ancient amphitheatre there were eighty or one hundred thousand people looking down from the galleries upon the combatants in the centre, so, says Paul, there is a great host of your friends in all the galleries of the sky, looking down upon our earthly struggles. It is a sweet, a consoling, a scriptural idea. With wing of angel, earth and heaven are in constant communication. Does not the Bible say: "Are they not sent forth as ministering spirits to those who shall be heirs of salvation?" And when ministering spirits come down and see us, do they not take some message back? It is impossible to realize, I know, the idea that there is such rapid and perpetual intercommunication of earth and heaven; but it is a glorious reality. You take a rail train and the train is in full motion, and another train from the opposite direction dashes past you so swiftly that you are startled: all the way between here and heaven is filled with the up trains and the down trains—spirits coming—spirits going—coming—going—coming—going. That friend of yours who died last month—do you not suppose he told all the family news about you in the good land to the friends who are gone? Do you not suppose that when there are hundreds of opportunities every day for them in heaven to hear from you that they ask about you? that they know your tears, your temptations, your struggles, your victories? Aye, they do. Perhaps during the last war you had a boy in the army, and you got a pass and you went through the lines and you found him, and the regiment coming from your neighborhood, you knew most of the boys there. One day you started for home. You said: "Well, now, have you any letters to send? Any messages to send?" And they filled your pockets with letters, and you started home. Arriving home, the neighbors came in, and one said: "Did you see my John?" and others: "Did you see George?" "Do you know anything about my Frank?" And then you brought out the letters and gave them the messages of which you had been the bearer. Do you suppose that angels of God, coming down to this awful battle-field of sin, and sorrow, and death, and meeting us and seeing us, and finding out all about us, carry back no message to the skies?

O, there is consolation in it! You are in present communication with that land. They are in sympathy with you now more than they ever were, and they are waiting for the moment when the hammer stroke shall shatter the last chain of your earthly bondage and your soul shall spring upward; and, they will stand on the heights of heaven and see you come; and when you are within hailing distance your other friends will be called out, and, as you flash through the pearl-hung gate, their shout will make the hills tremble: "Hail! ransomed spirit, to the city of the blessed."

I console you still further with the idea of a resurrection. I know there are a great many people who do not accept this because they cannot understand it; but, my friends, there are two stout passages—I could bring a hundred, but two swarthy passages are enough—and one David will strike down the largest Goliath. "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth." The other swarthy passage is this: "The Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first." Oh, there will be such a thing as a resurrection.

You ask me a great many questions I cannot answer about this resurrection. You say, for instance: "If a man's body is constantly changing, and every seventh year he has an entirely new body, and he lives on to seventy years of age, and so has had ten different bodies, and at the hour of his death there is not a particle of flesh on him that was there in the days of his childhood — in the resurrection, which of the ten bodies will come up, or will they all rise?" You say: "Suppose a man dies and his body is scattered in the dust, and out of that dust vegetables grow, and men eat the vegetables, and cannibals slay these men and eat them, and cannibals fight with cannibals until at last there shall be a hundred men who shall have within them some particles that started from the dead body first named, coming up through the vegetable, through the first man who ate it, and through the cannibals who afterward ate him, and there be more than a hundred men who have rights in the particles of that body—in the resurrection how can they be assorted when these particles belong to them all? You say: "There is a missionary buried in Greenwood, and when he was in China he had his arm amputated—in the resurrection, will that fragment of the body fly sixteen thousand miles to join the rest of the body?" Have you any more questions to ask? any more difficulties to suggest? any more mysteries? Bring them on! Against a whole regiment of scepticism, I will march these two champions: "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth." "The Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first." You see I stick to these two passages. Who art thou, oh, fool, that thou repliest against God? Hath he promised, and shall he not do it? Hath he commanded, and shall he not bring it to pass? Have you not confidence in his omnipotence? If he could, in the first place, build my body, after it is torn down, can he not build it again?

"Oh," you say; "I would believe that if you would explain it. I am not disposed to be sceptical, but explain how it can be done." My brother, you believe a great many things you cannot explain. You believe your mind acts on your body. Explain the process. This seed planted comes up a blue flower. Another seed planted comes up a yellow flower. Another seed planted comes up a white flower. Why? Why that wart on your finger? Explain these. Can you not do it? Then I will not explain the resurrection. You explain one-half of the common mysteries of every-day life, and I will explain all the mysteries of the resurrection. You cannot answer me very plain questions in regard to ordinary affairs. I am not ashamed to say that I cannot explain God, and the judgment, and the resurrection. I simply accept them as facts.

Before the resurrection takes place, everything will be silent. The mausoleums and the labyrinths silent. The graveyards silent, the cemetery silent, save from the clashing of hoofs and the grinding of wheels as the last funeral procession comes in. No breath of air disturbing the dust where Persepolis stood, and Thebes, and Babylon. No winking of the eyelids long closed in darkness. Silence from ocean beach to mountain cliff, and from river to river. The sea singing the same old tune. The lakes hushed to sleep in the bosom of the same great hills. No hand disturbing the gate of the long-barred sepulchre. All the nations of the dead motionless in their winding-sheets. Up the side of the hills, down through the trough of the valleys, far out in the caverns, across the fields, deep down into the coral palaces of the ocean depths —everywhere, layer above layer, height above height, depth below depth—dead! dead! dead! But in the twinkling of an eye, as quick as that, as the archangel's trumpet comes pealing, rolling reverberating, crashing across continents and seas, the earth will give one fearful shudder and the door of the family vault, without being unlocked, will burst open; and all the graves of the dead will begin to throb and heave like the waves of the sea; and the mausoleum of princes will fall into the dust; and the shipwrecked rise from the deep, their wet locks looming above the billow; and all the land and all the sea become one moving mass of life—all generations, all ages with upturned countenances — some kindled with rapture and others blanched with despair, but gazing in one direction, upon one object, and that the throne of resurrection!

On that day you will get back your Christian dead. There is where the comfort comes in. They will come up with the same hand, the same foot, and the same entire body; but with a perfect hand, and a perfect foot, and a perfect body; corruption having become incorruption, mortality having become immortality. And oh, the re-union; oh, the embrace after so long an absence. Comfort one another with these words.

While I present these thoughts this morning, does it not seem that heaven comes very near to us, as though our friends, whom we thought a great way off, are not in the distance, but close by? You have sometimes come down to a river at night-fall, and you have been surprised how easily you could hear voices across that river. You shouted over to the other side of the river, and they shouted back. It is said that, when George Whitefield preached in Third street, Philadelphia, one evening time, his voice was heard clear across to the New Jersey shore. When I was a little while chaplain in the army, I remember how at even-tide we could easily hear the voices of the pickets across the Potomac just when they were using ordinary tones. And as we come to-day and stand by the river of Jordan that divides us from our friends who are gone, it seems to me we stand on one bank and they stand on the other, and it is only a narrow stream, and our voices go and their voices come. Hark! Hush! I hear distinctly what they say: "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." Still the voice comes across the water, and I hear: "We hunger no more, we thirst no more; neither shall the sun light on us, nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne leads us to living fountains of water, and God wipeth away all tears from our eyes."

A Gospel for Red and Black.

maintained at an annual cost of about $155,000. The negro students in the Institute produce through their labor about $55,000, and the balance of the expenditures is covered by appropriations by the State of Virginia, by Congress and by the income from an endowment fund. The net cost of training, supporting and clothing each scholar is about $154 a year.

A great stimulus to the Institute has been the 16,000 negro free schools of the South—nearly 2,000 in Virginia alone—costing the ex-slave states nearly four millions of dollars a year in taxation. Northern charity, at the rate of about a million dollars a year, with liberal Southern state aid in some cases, is supplying over twenty strong Normal and Collegiate institutes, mostly under church auspices, where nearly 5,000 negro youth of both sexes are being fitted to teach and lead their people. The negro girls have proved successful teachers. In his last report of the condition of these schools, Gen. Armstrong estimated that the work had cost from its inception to date, the round sum of $1,350,000, exclusive of endowments. The real estate and other property of the Institute represents a value of $500,000.

To fully review the work accomplished by this remarkable man during the last twenty years of his life—the period of real growth in the Hampton experiment—would occupy many pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He was one of whom it can truly be said that he showed his faith by his works. With missionary parents and missionary surroundings in early youth, it was not surprising that he should have united to the courage of the soldier the zeal and fervor of the evangelist. His character, in many particulars, was like that of "Chinese Gordon"—great in faith, instant in action, when duty pointed the way. Under his inspiration, Hampton Institute became not only a civilizing, but a Christianizing agency. Every year, on simple faith, he undertook to supply $50,000 to meet a deficit of that amount, over and above all the income. His was, on an extensive scale, a duplication of the experience of the late Pastor Spurgeon, George Muller, and, the late Dr. Cullis, all of whom may be said to have kept their godly philanthropies alive and active by faith alone. And the holy spirit of the leader was communicated to those around him. The students were put on their honor, as to conduct and discipline. Their benevolent and missionary spirit was stimulated, and they were urged to do local missionary work, visiting the poor, the prisoners, the paupers and the sick. He met the students at evening prayers and at Sunday service, and at every opportunity helped the development of their spiritual natures. Addressing them, one Sunday evening shortly before he died, he said: "You think it a fine thing to belong to the Grand Army of the Republic. Yes, so it is; but the greatest of all is to belong to the Grand Army of God's workers. Any one of you can belong to that, as so many of Hampton's students have."

At the end, when laboring under the last fatal attack of heart disease and paralysis, he still found breath and strength to give voice to the testimony of his faith. "I want to go," said the dying Christian hero. "I am through with this world; my work is finished." He shortly afterward expired.

Hampton Institute (which is shown in the illustration on the first page of this issue), occupies a site of great natural beauty and healthfulness, on the eastern shore of Hampton Creek, a little below the town of Hampton, Va. It is now controlled by a Board of Trustees, and the religious teaching is evangelical. It is neither a college nor a university, but a school adapted to the immediate needs of the negro and the Indian youth. There are thirty-two buildings in all, including William Hall, the Sloane Memorial Building for colored girls and a hall for Indian girls; Academic Hall, used for school and recitation-rooms, and boys' sleeping rooms; Virginia Hall, used for girls' and teachers' rooms. There are also a large chapel, students' dining-room, knitting-room, two cottages for boys, a wigwam for the use of Indian students, dwelling-houses for the managers and teachers, brick school-houses and other necessary accommodations. Some of the buildings had previously been used as barracks, etc., during the war. The Institute owns a farm of 339 acres, called "Shellbanks," on a small river, five miles from the school. This farm (the gift of a friend), is used for keeping and raising stock, and in summer, as an Indian camp. The labor upon it is mainly performed by the students, the institution being founded on the manual labor plan. In 1879, the laboratories and apparatus were destroyed by fire, and the museum and library also have been greatly injured by fire. The Southern Workman, a weekly paper, is printed on the grounds.

Besides the ordinary departments of instruction, a three years' course of English branches, including mathematics, algebra, with intellectual philosophy, civil government, political economy, book-keeping, history, English literature and composition, natural philosophy and chemistry. Instruction is given in farming, carpentry, shoemaking, blacksmithing, tailoring, iron and tin-work, housework, cooking, and sewing and knitting by machine. The school has a military organization, and an officer of the army is detailed by the government to give instruction.

One of the principal objects of the institution, is to raise up teachers for the free schools of the South. From 10,000 to 20,000 colored children were taught by those graduates in 1879–80, and their work is highly prized by the educational directors of the South. Since 1878 the institution has had as pupils a considerable number of Indian youth, and the result of this effort to instruct them in the elements of civilized life has been far-reaching. They come from many different tribes,—the Sioux, Sac and Fox, Chippewa, Shawnee, Hawk, Crow, Blackfeet, Gros Ventre, Arickaree, Mandan, Cherokee, Cheyenne, Kiowa, Arapahoe, Comanche, Winnebago, Pima, Omaha, Apache, Mohave, Brule and others. Hundreds of these Indian boys and girls—most of them full-blooded scions of very warlike tribes—have undergone a complete transformation at the Institute, and many are now teaching native schools in their own country. Native chiefs, who have given the government trouble in the past and who have at different times stirred up cruel wars against the whites, have in later years been induced to send their sons and daughters to Hampton. Here the Indian prisoners from Fort Marion, Fla., were civilized and christianized as well, and here, ten years after the Custer massacre, "Rain-in-the-Face," the notorious Modoc applied for admission as a pupil! His example has since been followed by other chiefs and many who are too old themselves have sent their sons and daughters. The results achieved in this line of work alone are almost sufficient to justify all the loving labor and expenditures of years at Hampton. Many of the Indian young men and women have returned to their tribes and, have been, under the Divine blessing, the means of leading others to a Christian life. Some are preachers and teachers, others are farmers or tradesmen and nearly all have made excellent records. A few have died rejoicing in the faith. Every student in the Institute knew that Gen. Armstrong expected him to help his brethren as he was being helped.

With the negro pupils, progress was necessarily more rapid than with the untutored Indians, and to-day they are found in every avenue of educational industrial and Christian work throughout the Union. Thus the experiment of Hampton has reached out to the ends of a continent and has been the divinely ordered means of conferring upon two races an intellectual and spiritual elevation which Congresses, legislatures and secular philanthropies could not bestow.

HOW TO AVOID TEMPTATION.

AN old legend tells how a man once asked an Eastern king if he could tell him how to avoid temptation.

The king told the man to take a jug brimful of oil and to carry it through the streets of the city without spilling one drop.

"If one drop is spilt," said the king, "your head shall be cut off." And he ordered two executioners, with drawn swords, to walk behind the man and to carry out his orders.

There happened to be a fair going on in town, and the streets were crowded with people. However, the man was very careful, and he returned to the king without having spilt one drop of the oil. Then the king asked: "Did you see any one whilst you were walking through the streets?" "No," said the man, "I was only thinking of the oil; I noticed nothing else." "Then," said the king, "you notice how to avoid temptation. Fix your mind as firmly on God as you fix it on the vessel of oil, you will not then be tempted to sin."

PAUL CALLED TO EUROPE.

S S. Lesson for July 2 Acts. 16: 6-15. Golden Text, Matt. 28: 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

PAUL'S call to missionary work had come, like that of many others, from the Lord himself, in his general missionary commission to his disciples: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. 28: 10-21.) But he had also received an individual call of the Holy Ghost when, at Antioch, he had "ministered to the Lord and fasted," with the rest of the disciples, and the Holy Ghost had said: "Separate me Barnabas and Paul for the work whereunto I have called them." (Acts 18: 2.) This call was no light matter to the apostle; he says: "Necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." And again: "A dispensation of the Gospel is committed unto me." (1. Cor. 9: 16, 17.) And again he speaks of himself as "the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the Gospel of God." (Rom. 15: 16.) The first synod of the primitive church had been held in Jerusalem, to consider the vexed question whether it was obligatory in the converted Gentiles to keep the Jewish law. Paul's presence there was of the utmost importance, he being, by God's appointment, "the apostle of the Gentiles." (Rom. 11: 13), and being therefore their representative among the Jewish brethren. This Synod ended, Paul and Barnabas returned again to Antioch, "teaching and preaching the Word." But the call to which they had already responded in their missionary journey, still sounded in their hearts, they had no liberty to spend all their time in Antioch, the remembrance of their converts in Asia Minor was pressed upon them, and Paul said to Barnabas: "Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the Word of the Lord, and see how they do." How far Paul had a regarding this new move is not apparent. Probably a conscious burden, a sense of being occupied involuntarily with the converts he had left, may have come over his spirit direct from the Spirit of God. Many of God's children learn the will of God in this manner. Standing ready at all times to be sent hither or thither, to be called to this or that, they stand loose from any self-made plans and any choice of their own as to their movements; and gradually, almost unconsciously, the Holy Spirit brings them into unison with the thoughts of God by the sense of burden about a place or about a person. Undoubtedly Paul knew it was the will of God that he should go forth to strengthen the hands of the converts left behind.

Distinct and Specific Direction

Accompanied by Silas, and "recommended by the brethren to the grace of God," he went [illegible] churches. Arrived at Derbe and Lystra, where he had been stoned, and so miraculously re- [illegible] he was closely drawn. It was Timothy of whom he said: "I have no man likeminded." (Phil. 2: 20); whom he calls "my own son in the faith." "My dearly beloved son." This young man was, like Paul himself, partly of Jewish and partly of foreign extraction, but his mother was a godly woman who had grounded him well in the Scriptures. Paul joined the young man to their little company, first taking the precaution to circumcise him, lest his presence with Paul as the son of a Greek, should cause harm to the cause of God by awakening prejudice.

For a time all went well, and nothing transpired to make them doubt they were in the will of God. They were occupied in delivering to the churches the decrees passed at the Jerusalem synod, and they were established in the faith and increased in number daily. But many have yet to learn what they then learned, that the will of God at one part of our course may not be his will for our whole lives. Because Philip was so much used of God at Samaria it was not therefore the will of God that he should always abide there, or even always be occupied in large cities; his next call was to the desert for the sake of one soul! The same Elijah whose words to Ahab and to the people were so mighty, served God in silence by the brookside just as faithfully as when that was the call of God to him. Paul and his two followers had gone throughout Phrygia and Galatia (both provinces of Asia Minor), when a sudden and unexpected stop was put to a course which, up till now, had been fully marked by the blessing of God: they "were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia!" What could this mean? Had they been wrong up till now? Had they mistaken the mind of God? If it were wrong to preach in Asia now, must it not have been wrong to preach there previously? Such are the thoughts with which Satan loves to fill the mind and intellect of God's children, so that he may bring about a feeling of unrest and discomfort, and distract them from hearing the voice of God in the present moment. We may be quite sure that our Shepherd is too true to leave us on a wrong path without telling us, but, if indeed we are his own sheep, his own property, he has a perfect right to change our path whenever he will. Paul did not argue, did not reason, did not attempt to systematize the guidance of his God. Paul knew his place as the creature of the great Creator and obeyed. Arrived at Mysia, another province of Asia Minor, they essayed to go into Bithynia, a province lying to the north of Galatia and Mysia, but again the some prohibition was upon them: "the Spirit suffered them not."

Thus hemmed in on the north and south, Paul went straight forward towards the west, until he arrived at Troas, the ancient Troy. All this time his directions had been negative, he had no positive leading. Paul had patiently endured, and now light broke upon his path. In a night vision, "a man of Macedonia stood and prayed him, saying: Come over into Macedonia and help us." With the vision came a certainty of direction: "After he had seen the vision immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the Gospel unto them."

But what about the expense of all this waiting? What about the impression which others might have of our callousness and indolence if we were to wait thus for direction? God be praised that he never sends us on a warfare at our own charges. He makes himself responsible for all which he commands. He who could afford to sacrifice the reputation of Joseph, his only witness in Egypt and to leave him under the terrible stigma which lay upon him, he who could afford to leave Naaman under the impression, given him by Gehazi that after all, Elisha did care for his money and garments, he who could afford to let the man whom he called a perfect man and an upright, be stripped of his reputation for piety,—may see that his tried children can be purified in no furnace so thoroughly as that in which they must lie speechless and condemned under misapprehension and wrong judgment.

When Paul did get the clue to the mind of God, no lingering love for the work and for the converts left in Asia hindered him. God wanted him elsewhere, this was all and everything to him. So he made a journey by sea to reach the first city where he could land in Macedonia, with as much expedition as the facilities for traveling in those days afforded him. Philippi was the destination of the ship, and the account runs: "We were in that city abiding certain days." What was their occupation? What could it have been but taking counsel with God, unless, indeed, they were at the same time seeking employment, for Paul was no idler, and was not in the habit of eating any man's bread for naught.

Before the Sabbath came round Paul had discovered that there were some in Philippi who prayed to the living God, and finding their place of resort was by the riverside,—it may have been a single room, or possibly in the open air—he that resorted thither." The women? Yes; nothing is said of men in this little prayer meeting. But is it conceivable that the God of the universe would interrupt the bishop-like labors of Paul in such an immense diocese as Asia Minor and Syria, for the sake of a few Gentile women in Europe, who, in their simplicity bent together before God in prayer by the riverside, crying for light and life from heaven? Yes, thank God, "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." God has never yet despised the day of small things. One woman had been prepared beforehand, and God opened her heart that she attended, or gave heed to, the things spoken. She seems to have been a woman of business, probably well known in her day; a woman of some force of character, intellect and influence. Instant decision for the Lord followed on the conviction which resulted from God's message by Paul, and, notwithstanding all that such a step might involve, this first European convert from heathenism sought to avow her faith publicly by baptism, induced her whole household to follow her, and boldly received into her house the teachers of that new doctrine which was shortly to rouse the whole city into persecution. From this little beginning, Christianity took root in Europe, and now European missionaries go back to the countries from which Paul came to Europe to carry back the Word of God where Mohammedanism has stamped out the remains of the faith of Jesus. The Lord God be with them and prosper them!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SIX months ago, our study of the Acts of the Apostles closed with the meeting of the great council in Jerusalem about the year fifty. The council decided, as will be remembered, that Gentile Christians might be admitted to the Church without becoming Jews. Paul and Barnabas, doubtless much relieved in mind by the decision, set out to tell the good news to the churches. At Antioch, however, a dispute arose between the companions. Barnabas wanted to take his cousin, John Mark, with them, but Paul objected. The man had deserted them once and Paul wanted no more to do with such a man. Barnabas seems to have persisted and Paul was equally firm. Finally, not being able to agree, they separated and Paul choosing another companion went on. This companion was Silas (Paul calls him Sylvanus in his epistles), who was one of the brethren from Jerusalem whom the council sent with Paul and Barnabas to Antioch to corroborate their report of the proceedings of the council. With Silas, therefore, and Timothy, a young convert whom Paul picked up at Derbe, he began his second long journey, which occupied from three to four years. Paul was recommended by the brethren to the grace of God. As we do not read of Barnabas being so commended we may conclude that the brethren sympathized with Paul in the recent quarrel. In spite of his experience and in spite of the cordiality of the council Paul seems to have had a longing to preach to the Jews. His mission, however, was to the Gentiles and in some way he was thwarted in his desire and, true to his habit of acceping circumstances as indications of the divine will, he yielded. He turned his face toward Europe. He reached Troas, a town near the site of the ancient city of Troy celebrated by Homer. It stood on the coast of Asia Minor near the strait now known as the Dardanelles. There Paul had a dream from which he concluded that his next sphere of labor was to be Macedonia, a country to the north of Greece, now a part of the Turkish Empire. He set out immediately with his companions and we judge by the use in the narrative of the pronoun "we," instead of "they," that Luke joined the party at Troas. It is conjectured that Paul was ill while at Troas and that Luke attended him as a physician. The friendship must have been very pleasant and helpful to Paul. As we can perceive by his writing, both in the Acts and in the Gospel that bears his name, Luke was a close and careful observer, an intelligent, cultured man, whose habit of keeping a record of daily events, has laid many generations of Christians under obligation to him.

Forbidden of the Holy Ghost. When a man devotes himself to the Lord's work he must expect to be thwarted in his own ideas and plans and must be ready to submit to guidance. Mr. Beecher in one of his sermons, thus illustrated the fact: A man says to his agent: "I want you to go on a business tour for me. First go to Buffalo. Here is the money and here the directions you will need while you are there. Thence go to Cleveland, and there you will find remittances and further direction. When you get to Cincinnatti you will find more money and other directions. At St. Louis you will find others and at New Orleans more." "But," says the agent, "suppose when I get to Cleveland or any of the other places I should not find anything?" He is so afraid that he will not, that he asks the man to give him money and directions for the whole tour before he starts. "No," says the man, "it will be sufficient for you if you have the money and directions you need for each place when you get to it, and when you do get to it you will find them there." Now God sends men in the same way. "Here is your duty for to-day, and the means with which to do it. I will be with you at all times and will see that you have strengh for every emergency."

Come over and help us. Macedonia was, we are told, a colony. It could have had no greater need than for the visit of Paul and his companions. The help they could give would be more valuable to the colony than any other kind of help. The charter of Massachusetts granted by Charles I. contains an expression of the hope that the settlers to whom it is granted "may win and incite the natives of the country to the knowledge and obedience of the only true God and Saviour of mankind and the Christian faith, which in our royal intention, and the adventurers' free profession, is the principal end of this plantation." The first seal of Massachusetts represents an Indian giving utterance to the words, "Come over and help us." Small reason had the Indian to be thankful for the kind of help he got and small reason now has the native of Africa to be thankful for the coming of the white man who brings him rum and firearms and encourages him to destroy his brother and drink himself to death. But the white man who will give him the Gospel and tell him of Christ, is, if he only knew it, the best friend he could have on earth.

Gathering that the Lord had called us. The Lord has many ways of calling his people to do a particular work for him. In this case a dream was used. Sometimes it is only the ordinary circumstances of everyday life. It is an evidence of a man belonging to God when he recognizes God's voice in the affairs of life or however it comes and obeys. The man who does not belong to him does not recognize the voice. A man in India was accused of stealing a sheep. He was brought before the judge, and the supposed owner of the sheep was present. Both claimed the sheep and had witnesses to prove their claims; so it was not easy to decide to whom the sheep belonged. Knowing the habits of the shepherds and the sheep, the judge ordered the animal to be brought into court and sent one of the two men into the other room while he told the other to call the sheep and see whether it would come to him. But the poor sheep, not knowing "the voice of a stranger" would not go to him. In the meantime, the other man in the adjoining room growing impatient, gave a kind of call, upon which the sheep bounded away toward him at once. This call was the way in which he had been used to call the sheep and it was at once decided that he was the real owner.

Where prayer was wont to be made It looks as if these women were there often and it is a matter for thankfulness that we may go as often as we will to God in prayer. In the vestibule of St. Peter's at Rome is a doorway which is walled up and marked with a cross. It is opened but four times in a century; once in every twenty-five years, on Christmas eve, the Pope approaches in princely state, with his retinue of cardinals in their robes and gives the signal for its demolition by striking it thrice with a silver hammer. When the passage is opened, the people pass through the nave and up to the altar by an avenue which the majority of them never trod before and never will again. Imagine what it would be if the way to God were like this Porta Sancta, open only once in a quarter of a century!

A place where prayer is wont to be made need not be a very grand place or one specially consecrated. The place mentioned in the lesson was probably a very humble one as it was by the river-side. A pious sailor was once asked how he could find a place to pray on board so busy a place as the ship appeared to be. "Oh," said he, "I can always get a quiet spot at the mast-head."

SAVING "SOMEBODY'S DAUGHTERS."

Mrs. Williamson Tells of Twenty Years' Rescue Work in the Slums—A Plea for a Permanent Lodging-House for Homeless Girls—The Florence Mission Rescue Band and its Work Among the Lost Girls of New York City.

FOUND DEATH ON THE STOOP.

"MY life has been a life of faith for nineteen years, for during all that time I have been called to labor among the unsaved."

The speaker was a slightly built woman, with bright eyes and a face expressing cheerfulness and confidence. Hardly yet in middle life, she has been active in the service of the Master for a much longer period than ordinarily falls to the lot of even the most devoted worker. Josephine S. Williamson was born in the north of Ireland and came to the United States when still very young. She was converted in her own home in Leonardville, Monmouth Co., N. J., the death of her husband having been made instrumental in bringing her soul to the Saviour.

"Right after I was saved," she explains, "I went out after souls and have been at it ever since."

Her whole life, since that eventful episode, has been a ministry of love. She felt that she must communicate her happiness to others and so she chose the class of all classes the most miserable and wretched—the unfortunates of the slums. Her work among them has been wonderfully blessed of God, and she has been the means of turning many of these daughters of sin to purer and nobler lives.

At the outset of her new career, Mrs. Williamson became connected with the Margaret Strachan Home for Fallen Girls, in New York City, and afterward with the Jerry McAuley Mission on Water Street. She next continued her work among the unsaved in connection with the Midnight Mission on Greene Street and the Whittemore Home.

For a brief period she conducted with her own means, a retreat called Christ's Home on West Thirty-third Street, and it was during those months that one of the most remarkable conversions took place. A beautiful and finely educated girl, the daughter of a business man of Syracuse, had fallen into a life of sin. For sometime after leaving home, she revelled in the luxury of vice, but—as invariably follows—she gradually sunk until the lowest stage of moral and physical degradation was reached. She became a victim to drugs and was widely known among the patrons of the slums as "Morphine Laura." When Mrs. Williamson made an effort to reform the girl, she found the latter in a sorry plight, wasted by disease and the baneful drug which enslaved her. Laura was led to Christ and gave evidence of conversion and a complete change of heart. After her death, many of her old associates in sin crowded around her coffin and not a few then pledged themselves to the Saviour and a new life.

For many years past, Mrs. Williamson has been with the Florence Mission, as its most active and successful worker on the streets and in the slums. "The Lord has used me," she quaintly expresses it, "from half past ten o'clock in the morning until half past five, on my feet, talking with sinners. My principal places for labor have been the Battery, the City Hall steps and the Five Points. Our object is to get the girls work. If they have work and are taken from their old associates and haunts, and form new acquaintances, they are not liable to be drawn back to sin. In order to avert it we must have places to put them in.

"Many hundreds have been saved through the Florence Mission," she continued. "Many of the girls, brought in from lives of sin, are doing well and married and raising families; others are out working in a variety of employments.

"In connection with the slum work, in the late hours of the night, when hotels and lodging houses were closed, we found we had no place to shelter the girls except lodging them in the station-house until the next morning, for they were generally so poorly clad that we could not take them to any of the hotels or lodging houses. Women with wretched garments are not admitted to such places. The only lodging in the city of New York that I know of as being available for such cases is in Rivington Street, and that closes at eleven o'clock. If a woman has taken intoxicating drink she will not be admitted there either. There is nowhere else, except alleys, halls of buildings or the station-house, for these wretched creatures!"

In view of this condition of affairs, Mrs. Williamson, together with Miss Belle Doyle (one of the rescued girls), has decided to make a strenuous effort for the establishment of a permanent Girls' Lodging House in New York, where those who are rescued from the streets or the slums may be sheltered. Although the project has until now hardly been made public, many sympathetic letters have been received containing financial help to forward the plan.

"We find responses from all classes," said Mrs. Williamson, "and, strange to say, even from some dive-keepers. One of the subscribers is a Chinaman, who has become a Christian and who gives $3, for the establishment of a lodging for these poor American girls. Thus does China to some extent, repay its debt of gratitude to us."

Some of Mr. Williamson's experiences as a mission worker in the lowest social and moral strata of the metropolis are touching in the extreme. She has labored all these nineteen years without salary or remuneration from any earthly quarter, but she holds herself richly paid in the spiritual results.

"Some three months ago," she said, "a woman died in the slums of Bleecker street, on a stoop, alone and friendless. I knelt beside her, spoke words of spiritual consolation and hope into her ears and when the poor, weak, wicked life at last flickered out, I closed her eyes and had her cared for. Now, see how strangely the Lord works at times. A woman passing by saw me as I knelt there by the homeless, dying girl, and she stopped. She, too, although she had all the outward appearance of respectability, had been leading a life of sin. My simple action in caring for the other had touched the new-comer, and ultimately led to her conversion. We became acquainted, and soon I learned all about her. She is a Southern woman and, having renounced her sin and begun a new life, is now on her way to her husband in Texas.

"One day I walked into the backroom of an Italian dive in Elizabeth Street, in one of the lowest slums on the East side. It is one of those wretched places where the sodden victims of drink and sin lie around like brutes, sleeping with their heads on tables, in foul-smelling backrooms. I had been to this place before and knew some of the inmates. On this occasion I found there a young girl of eighteen, named Charlotte ——, who had been asleep. Her careless and tangled hair gave evidence of the life she was leading, but there was still in her face a trace of goodness that touched my heart with pity. I shook her by the shoulder until she awoke, and then while she still sat dazed, looking at me, I said:

" 'My child, this is no place for you. God wants your soul and he wants to use your body in a different way, besides giving it up to drink and sin.'

"She was a handsome girl with a soft, dark complexion, and the drink had as yet left few marks of dissipation on her face.

" 'Oh, Mrs. Williams!' she exclaimed. 'How can you come for me? You have advised me so often?'

" 'God sends me here, child, and I must deliver his message. I will not leave the place unless you come with me.' She looked at me hesitatingly for a moment, then with a sudden new-found resolution shining in her eyes, she stood up and said, 'I will come.' We went out together and she never went back to the old life again. She has now a good position and is living a Christian life."

One of the most sorrowful experiences in Mrs. Williamson's life occurred recently. Mollie ——, an attractive girl with a sweet and winning disposition, had left her home and gone to live with a young man belonging to the "hoodlum" class. Their room, in a grimy tenement, was the scene of nightly revel and dissipation. Mrs. Williamson had frequently met Mollie, and urged her with all the eloquence she possessed to abandon her life of sin.

"Ah, yes," the girl would answer with a little sigh, "sometime I will."

"But now is the accepted time," the visitor insisted. "Christ is waiting to welcome you now. Another time it may be too late."

The girl, however, could not be persuaded to make up her mind to the step which she really longed to take. Her companion in sin had become cruel and neglectful, and she began to feel the pangs of remorse. After all, she reasoned, it might be better to do as the lady advised and to reform. Yet she clung to her sin, although her better nature revolted at it; its fascination was powerful.

The end came suddenly and tragically. Her lover shot her dead, one night, after a quarrel, and poor Mollie went to her final account unrepentant, and in the midst of her sins! Her "sometime" never came!

Mollie is a type of many other girls of the same unfortunate class, who are gradually sinking lower and lower in the vicious life of the slums. Many of those encountered by Mrs. Williamson were born and brought up in the country in different parts of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Having fallen from virtue, they were either decoyed or found their way to New York, where they hide themselves away in the dark places of the great city. Once in the vortex, it is almost impossible for them to extricate themselves. They are nearly all addicted to the use of morphine, drugs, and liquor, thus adding to their terrible slavery. Hundreds have been released from this hideous bondage and brought to Christ through the instrumentality of the Florence Mission and its devoted Rescue Band, whose members invade saloons, low concert halls, and even Chinese resorts in the search for those poor wandering sheep that are waiting to be led back to the fold. Mulberry Bend with its Italian dives, the purlieus of Bleecker, Greene, Doyer, Mott, Pell, Delancey, and the Bowery are their familiar battle-ground where the struggle for souls goes on night after night the year round. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar with the touching story of the origin of the Florence Mission, which was founded by Mr. Charles N. Crittenden, a New York merchant, as a memorial to his dead daughter, Florence. It stands in Bleecker street near the Bowery, in the very heart of the district where its reformatory work is most needed. To hundreds of women dead in sin and shame it has proved a life-giving influence. Its hospitality has been extended to all comers and especially to girls who desire to make the effort to leave the paths of sin for those of purity and peace. Mrs. Pringle, a sincere, consecrated, Christian woman, is the matron. The Permanent Lodging House, for which Mrs. Williamson is now energetically working, will be a valuable adjunct to the main work of the Florence, although financially independent of the Mission. Any of our readers wishing to forward this most deserving philanthropic project, can do so by addressing Mrs. Williamson, Care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

DISCIPLES OF FASHION.

THERE will be fashion in heaven as on earth, but it will be a different kind of fashion. It will decide the color of the dress; and the population of that country, by a beautiful law, will wear white. I say these things as a background to show you that I have no prim, precise, prudish, or cast-iron theories on the subject of human apparel. But the goddess of fashion has set up her throne in this country and at the sound of the timbrels we are all expected to fall down and worship. The old and new testament of her bible are the fashion magazine and fashion bazar. Her altars smoke with the sacrifice of the bodies, minds, and souls of ten thousand victims. In her temple four people stand in the organ-loft, and from them there comes down a cold drizzle of music, freezing on the ears of her worshippers. This goddess of fashion has become a rival of the Lord of heaven and earth, and it is high time that we unlimbered our batteries against this idolatry. When I come to count the victims of fashion I find as many masculine as feminine. Men make an easy tirade against women, as though she were the chief worshiper at this idolatrous shrine.

Men are as much the idolators of fashion as women, but they sacrifice on a different part of the altar. With men, the fashion goes to cigars and club-rooms and yachting parties and wine suppers. In the United States the men consume one hundred millions of dollars' worth of tobacco every year. That is their fashion. In London, not long ago, a man died who started in life with seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but he ate it all up in gluttonies, sending his agents to all parts of the earth for some rare delicacy for the palate, sometimes one plate of food costing him three or four hundred dollars. He ate up his whole fortune, and had only one guinea left; with that he bought a woodcock, and had it dressed in the very best style, ate it, gave two hours for digestion, then walked out on Westminster Bridge and threw himself into the Thames, and died, doing on a large scale what you and I have often seen done on a small scale. But men do not abstain from millinery and elaboration of skirt through any superiority of humility. It is only because such appendages would be a blockade to business. What would sashes and trains three and a half yards long do in a stock market? And yet men are the disciples of fashion just as much as women. Some of them wear boots so tight they can hardly walk in the paths of righteousness. And there are men who buy expensive suits of clothes and never pay for them, and who go through the streets in great stripes of color like animated checker-boards. Then there are multitudes of men who, not satisfied with the bodies the Lord gave them, are padded so that their shoulders should be square, carrying around a small cotton plantation.

Do you know that Arnold of the Revolution proposed to sell his country in order to get money to support his wife's wardrobe? The effort to keep up expensive establishments in this country is sending more business men to temporal perdition than all other causes combined. There are clerks in stores and banks on limited salaries, who in the vain attempt to keep up the wardrobe of their family as showy as other folk's wardrobes, are dying of muffs, and diamonds, and camel's hair shawls, and high hats, and they have nothing left except what they give to cigars and wine suppers, and they die before their time and they will expect us ministers to preach about them as though they were the victims of early piety, and after a high-class funeral, with silver handles at the side of their coffin, of extraordinary brightness, it will be found out that the undertaker is cheated out of his legitimate expenses! Do not send to me to preach the funeral sermon of a man who dies like that. I will blurt out the whole truth, and tell that he was strangled to death by his wife's ribbons!

Inordinate fashion is the foe of all Christian alms-giving. Men and women put so much in personal display that they often have nothing for God and the cause of suffering humanity. A Christian man cracking his French glove across the back by shutting up his hand to hide the one cent he puts into the poor-box! A Christian woman, at the story of the Hottentots, crying copious tears into a twenty-five dollar handkerchief, and then giving a two-cent piece to the collection, thrusting it down under the bills so people will not know but it was a ten-dollar gold piece! One hundred dollars for incense to fashion. Two cents for God.

A WORD TO EMPLOYERS.

BE not among those who never say anything to a mechanic, but find fault. If he has done a job well, tell him so. The book is well bound, the door is well grained, the chandelier is well swung, the work is grandly accomplished. Be not among those employers who never say anything to their employees except to swear at them. Do not be afraid you will make that mechanic so puffed up and arrogant he will never again want to be seen with working apron or in shirt sleeves, for before the night comes of that day when you praise him there will be a lawsuit brought against him because he did not finish his work as soon as he promised it, forgetful of the fact that his wife has been sick and two of his children have died of scarlet fever and he has had a felon on a finger of the right hand. Denounced, perhaps, because the paint is so very faint in color, not recognizing the fact that the mechanic himself has been cheated out of the right ingredients and that he did not find out the trouble in time; or scolded at because he seems to have lamed a horse by unskilful shoeing, when the horse has for months become spavined, or ringbone, or springhalt. You feel you have the right to find fault with a mechanic when he does ill. Do you ever praise a mechanic when he does well?

If you desire to do your whole duty to the men and women in your service: first of all, then, pay as large wages as are reasonable and your business will afford. Not necessarily what others pay, certainly not what your hired help say you must pay, for that is tyranny on the part of labor unbearable.

Moreover, it is your duty as employer, as far as possible, to mould the welfare of the employee. You ought to advise him about investments, about life insurance, about savings banks. You ought to give him the benefit of your experience. There are hundreds and thousands of employers in this country and England, I am glad to say, who are settling in the very best possible way the destiny of their employees. These men have built reading-rooms, libraries, concert halls, afforded croquet lawns, cricket grounds, gymnasiums, choral societies for their employees, and they have not merely paid the wages on Saturday, but through the contentment and the thrift and the good morals of their employees, they are paying wages from generation to generation forever.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H Little, McLean, Ill. Who was the grandfather of Joshua?

Elishama (see 1. Chron. 7: 26). He led the tribe of Ephraim, to which he belonged, in the march of the people (see Numbers 10: 22).

Reader. Where did observance of the "Week of Prayer" originate?

A few missionaries of different schools held a three days meeting for prayer in Lodiana, in India, in 1858, and the suggestion then arose that a request be made to all the Christian world for an annual week of prayer. The Evangelical Alliance soon published the call, and has ever since sent out the programme of topics to all Christendom, before the beginning of the year. Many revivals have followed this annual call to prayer.

A Constant Reader. What was Queen Victoria's maiden name, and what was her husband's surname?

The Queen's given names are Alexandrina Victoria. The former was an adaptation of the name Alexander, she having been named for the Czar of Russia of that name. She derived her name of Victoria from her mother. Her surname, we presume, was Guelph before she was married. The family name of Prince Albert was Wettin, so that if Queen Victoria were a private lady it would be correct to address her as Mrs. Wettin.

Subscriber, Cleveland, O. 1. When were the Clementines or Clementine Homilies first published? 2. Who was the author? 3. Were they and the so-called Apostolic Constitutions written by the same person?

1. They were ascribed to St. Clement, who was Bishop of Rome from 92 to 102. The majority of scholars, however, do not believe that he wrote them. It is believed that they were not written earlier than the fifth century. The author is unknown, but he was evidently an unscrupulous person, who wished to give his production the authority of St. Clement to which it was not entitled. 2. It is impossible to say with any degree of certainty. 3. The style of writing and other internal evidences indicate that they were not by the same author, but by an earlier one, though not by St. Clement.

E F Hinkley, Anson, Me. 1. Why, when and where did the practice begin of burying the dead facing the east? 2. Do you find any place in the Scriptures where God told the people to worship on the first day instead of the seventh?

1. We never heard of the practice. The custom is general to bury the body lying on its back, facing the sky. The Encyclopædia Britannica (Article on Funeral Rites), states that the early Christians buried their dead with the feet toward the east. The idea was that when they rose at the resurrection their faces might be toward the east where Christ would appear. 2. No; nor any place where God told the people to discontinue circumcision, or the offering of sacrifices, or the observance of the Passover, or many other observances commanded in the Old Testament, which under the better light of the Christian dispensation have become obsolete.

Jesse V Hecklen Elmwood, Neb. 1. You say on page [illegible] "We learn from sacred history, the partaking of the Lord's Supper every Sabbath morning was a custom in use among the Christians the primitive Church during the first three centuries." Will you please quote [illegible] Where in the Scriptures was the bread and the cup ever called the "Lord's Supper?"

1. Pliny, about the year 100 A.D., refers to the Lord's Supper having been celebrated regularly "on a stated day" (Epistles 10: 97). What the "stated day" was, he does not mention, but we learn the day from Justin Martyr, who wrote about forty years later. He writes: (Apol. 1: 67) "On the day called Sunday is an assembly of all who live either in the cities or rural districts, and the memoirs of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read" He then goes on to particularize, and among the exercises of the day, he mentions the Eucharist. Incidental references of other ancient writers show that the celebration of the Lord's Supper on the Lord's Day was customary in the early Church, as we said. Some of them mention also the collecting of alms at these assemblies, which shows that the apostle's advice had been taken (1. Cor. 16: 2). 2. See 1. Cor. 11: 20-25.

R. W. Hastings, Independence, Oreg. 1. Does the Bible teach anywhere that the heathen who do not know of Christ may be saved? 2. Is there any passage of Scriptures that assures us there will be another probation for those who reject Christ in this life?

1. No; the only passage that seems to touch the question so far as we know is Luke 12: 48, "He that knew not [his Lord's will] and did commit things worthy of stripes shall be beaten with few stripes." 2. No; there is no such assurance. Those who hope for it, base their hope on the possibility that the assurance was withheld, lest men should put off repentance until that second probation.

K. P. Barton, Tyler Tex. What is the meaning of the number of the Beast being 666 as stated in Rev. 13: 18?

The common belief is that the letters of the name of Antichrist will represent that number. The Greek letters have a numerical value like the letters on the face of your watch. If the numerical value of each letter in the name be added together, that is the number of the name. John said that one of the marks by which Antichrist might be identified would be that the total in his case would be 666.

Constant Reader, Baltimore, Md. 1. If the house of Rahab was on the wall of Jericho as stated (Joshua 2: 15) would it not be destroyed when the wall fell? How then could Joshua's men have gone into her house afterward and brought out all she had as stated (Joshua 6: 23). 2. Is the Holy Spirit as much a person as God the Father?

1. The difficulty is not explained in the Bible, so that any solution must be mere conjecture. It may be that her house was built close to the wall and the upper stories projecting, as was and still is common, may have been over the wall. In that case the fall of the wall may have left her house still standing. Or supposing the house actually being on the wall, if you admit the possibility of the miracle of the wall falling, you may easily go further and admit the possibility of the portion of the wall on which the house stood being miraculously exempted from the destruction of the other parts of the wall. 2. Yes; the personality of the Holy Spirit is clearly taught. He is represented as teaching (John 15: 26) sending, (Acts 13: 4) being grieved (Eph. 4: 30) and spoken of in other ways which imply not an essence, but a personality.

Subscriber, Adele, Neb. 1. What is meant by papers being sealed with the king's ring? (Esther 3: 12.) 2. Which is the proper method of baptism, immersion or sprinkling? 3. What is the address of Evangelist Jacoby?

1. The royal seal was generally worn by the king set in a gold ring. It might either be an engraved monogram on the metal or an intaglio. You may see at the present day men wearing rings in which stones are set that might be used as seals. In affixing his seal to a document the king made it a law. 2. Learned and pious men have disputed about this question for generations and are still at issue on it, without arriving at an agreement. If they should settle it, we shall have much pleasure in announcing the fact conspicuously in this journal. Until then, you should decide for yourself as you think the Bible teaches. A much more important question is whether "your heart is sprinkled from an evil conscience (Heb. 10: 22) and you have "been buried with Christ through baptism into death" (Rom. 6: 4). 3. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A MOORISH GATEWAY.

ONE of the most interesting towns of Morocco, standing on the road which leads south from Tangier, is Larache, the residence of the Governor of the Province. Its position at the mouth of the Koos River has given it some commercial prominence, as small vessels can make use of its harbor. It has been the scene of repeated struggles between the Moors and the Spaniards and Portuguese, who have besieged and captured it in turn and held it for longer and shorter periods. Not far away from it are the remains of the much more ancient Carthaginian city of Lixus, whose walls, parts of which still stand, were built of huge stones, sixteen feet long by four thick. Lixus is now deserted, but Larache flourishes, if any town in Morocco can be said to flourish. It presents many suggestive contrasts. In the midst of the present squalor rise stately edifices, the relics of the occupation of the various powers who have in turn had possession of it. One of these is the fine Moorish gateway represented in the illustration on this page. From its summit, Mr. Montbard, a recent traveler, says, the spectator has a fine view of the sea and river and of olive groves and orange groves stretching inland as far as the eye can reach. All around is beautiful, and the country might be one of the most delightful in the world, were it not for the character of its people and the incapacity and cruelty of its government. These make it a place to be avoided by prudent travelers. Perhaps the same thing may be said with some qualification, of all parts of this world, if some inhabitant of some other planet the people of which have not fallen into sin, could visit the earth and see how its beauties are marred by the wickedness of man. (Gen. 6: 12.)

A Grave Despoiled.

A WARRANT has been issued for the arrest of a prominent citizen of Cheyenne, Wyo., on the charge of stealing the body of his dead daughter from the Lombardy Cemetery, at Wilmington, Del. He went to Wilmington three weeks ago at the invitation of his daughter's husband to attend her funeral. He telegraphed in advance his urgent wish that she should be buried in his family lot at Oxford, Pa., and on his arrival he reiterated his wish. His son-in-law, however, had made arrangement for the funeral to be at the Lombardy Cemetery in Wilmington, and in spite of the old gentleman's wish, that arrangement was carried out. He was evidently disappointed, but finally yielded and, after attending the funeral, departed. Some days later, the husband of the dead lady heard that a mysterious interment had taken place at Oxford in the lot belonging to his deceased wife's family. His suspicions were aroused and he had his wife's grave opened. He found that the coffin containing her remains had been removed and the grave was empty. The cemetery authorities knew nothing about it and declared that the removal must have been made secretly in the night. The widowed husband thereupon applied for a warrant for the arrest of his father-in-law and the case will probably be before the courts at the next term. The lady, we may infer must have been much loved by both her father and her husband. The love in neither case, however, could have been very intelligent, or there would not have been the unseemly struggle over her inanimate form. One or both would have perceived that they were wrangling over a mere tenement from which their loved one had departed. If she could have spoken to them she might have asked them as the angel asked the women, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" (Luke 24: 5.)

A Choice of Passengers.

Two policemen of Flatbush, L. I., were placed in a dilemma a few days ago. They were called by telegraph late at night to bring the patrol wagon to an undertaking establishment on the line of the Brooklyn and Coney Island railroad. A man was lying there who had been severely injured in a collision between his wagon and an electric car; and the wagon was needed to take him to the King's County Hospital. Some of his ribs were broken, his shoulder was dislocated and his head cut. He looked, as he lay helpless across the chairs, as if he might die at any moment. Just as the wagon drove up there was a disturbance in a barber's shop a few doors away. A man who was waiting to be shaved had a sudden attack of delirium tremens. He rushed from the shop yelling at the top of his voice, with several persons following him. He was overtaken close to where the patrol wagon was drawn up. A fierce struggle ensued, but the inebriate was finally overcome and lifted into the wagon. It was thought dangerous to put the injured man in the wagon with him and after a hurried consultation the police decided to take the inebriate to the Hospital first and then return for the other patient. When they were reminded of the urgency of the latter's case, they said that he would be quiet without watching, while if the inebriate was left some one would have to stay to keep him from doing a mischief. That consideration decided them to give the inebriate the preference, and the injured man had to wait more than an hour while the other was taken to the hospital. The policemen's view of the respective merits of the two cases was natural to them, but it scarcely seems a just one. When a man has brought on his affliction by his own misconduct, he has not so much claim on the sympathy of his fellows, as he whose trouble comes from causes beyond his control. (Job 5: 16.)

The Washington Disaster.

A thrill of horror and indignation went through the country on June 9, when the news was telegraphed that a building used by the Government had collapsed, and that a number of clerks had been killed, and many others seriously injured. The building was originally Ford's Theatre, where President Lincoln was assassinated. The Government purchased the building after the commission of that crime, and used it as an army medical museum and library, and an office for the clerks of the Record and Pension Division of the War Department. Two new floors were stretched across the building, and on these and the first floor about five hundred clerks did their work. Many protests have been made from time to time, against the building being so used, as it was obviously unsafe. As far back as 1885 a report was make to Congress that the building was too weak to sustain the weight it was made to bear, and as an evidence of it the report said that one of the walls was already twelve inches out of plumb. The relics and library were moved out, as they could not be replaced, if they were destroyed; but, as the force of clerks could easily be renewed if they were killed, they were still kept at work in the tottering building, with its bulging walls. It was recently decided to put an electric plant in the basement, so that the clerks could work longer hours, and workmen were set to digging among the arches on which the building rested. They had dug down four feet when the catastrophe came. The floor on the top story at the front bent beneath the weight and broke. The clerks, with the desks and furniture, fell through on the heads of those below, breaking through that floor and the first floor, until they reached the basement, where they lay mixed with the timbers, and the lime and plaster of the ceilings, in an awful heap. Then the work of extrication commenced, and one dead body after another was brought out, with others still living, but so injured that death must soon come. Some others, also, were killed or badly hurt, by jumping from the windows when they saw the floor collapsing. Altogether, twenty-one dead and sixty-seven more or less severely hurt, is the record of this catastrophe. Col. Lamont has ordered an investigation to fix the responsibility. It may be hoped that it will be thorough and impartial. It is too much to hope that the persons really responsible will stand in a felon's dock, where they should stand, to be tried for manslaughter, due to their criminal negligence. Such a spectacle would teach a wholesome and much-needed lesson, but the whole gang will probably escape. Only for this life, however. The thought which consoled the Preacher centuries ago, when he saw the wicked go unpunished, is still sound: "He that is higher than the highest regardeth" (Eccles. 5: 8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. G. F. Pentecost, D.D., formerly pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, having been formally admitted to the Presbyterian Church, has now fully entered on the pastorate at Marylebone, London.

A Presbyterian missionary who came to Washington, D. C., said he had travelled two-thirds around the globe to tell the church of its work on his field and he was given just seven minutes in which to tell his story.

Mr. E. J. Glave, who accompanied Stanley in his last African expedition, has set out on a journey through Africa, to investigate the present condition and extent of the slave trade, with a view to furnishing a statement on which intelligent measures for its suppression may be based. Mr. Glave goes out under the auspices of the Century Magazine.

Two missionary bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church were consecrated in New York on June 14. They were Dr. Frederick R. Graves, who goes to China, and Dr. John McKim, who goes to Japan. Both clergymen have done valuable work as missionaries in the respective countries to which they now go as bishops. The Japanese bishopric has been four years vacant, its last holder being Dr. Channing M. Williams, who resigned in 1889.

Only two hundred houses now remain of the town of Zante, where, a few months ago, there were 4,500. All the others have been demolished or rendered uninhabitable by the succession of earthquake shocks, which still continue at intervals. They commenced on March 1, and the most severe one was on April 17. Only fifty persons were killed in a population of 40,000, the majority of them having left their homes and taken to tent life on the hills when the shocks began.

The American Home Missionary Society held its sixty-seventh anniversary at Saratoga, N.Y., on May 31. Eight hundred delegates representing forty States were present. Gen. O.O. Howard, of the U. S. Army, who is President of the Society, made an address warmly advocating the claims of the Society and speaking in strong terms of the value of its work. The Society has over two thousand workers. Last year it organized one hundred and forty new churches, and of those formerly organized by it, seventy-five became self-supporting.

Mr. John Wanamaker writing in answer to a question addressed to him by a contemporary on the subject of the World's Fair says: "I am inclined to believe that Christian people ought not to assist in any way in making successful an Exhibition which would never have received the approval and support of the people of the United States in its preparation, if it had had ever been supposed that when the Exposition was finally opened, the provisions of the acts of Congress authorizing and assisting it, were to be ignored in defiance of the public sentiment of what was supposed to be a large majority of the population of this country."

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

A SACRED HERITAGE.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, June 18, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text:—"Lest I mar my own inheritance." (Ruth 4: 6.)

THE story of the bridal ceremonies of Ruth and Boaz is beautiful as a dream. It abounds in touches which make the whole world kin. An obstacle to the marriage, according to the Levirate law, existed which might have interrupted the course of true love, and which might have changed the future of Ruth and Boaz, and even the inspired record in the Bible. There was no obstacle to the marriage in the heart of either Boaz or Ruth; there was none in his circumstances, nor in her desires. The only obstacle was technical and legal. This difficulty must be removed, or the marriage between the prosperous yeoman and the beautiful widow cannot be consummated.

The Scene at the Gate.

The facts of the case at this point give us a suggestive glimpse of the solemn manner and peculiar ceremonies of that primitive time. We are carried at once to the city gate, through which all the tows-folk must pass. This gate was the place of gossiping, of marketing, and of marrying. It was the court house and the town hall of the city. On this particular morning Boaz is on hand early. Great and tender thoughts are in his heart, but strange fears disturb his peace, as many tender hopes are in the balance. He receives and returns kindly salutations as he approaches; his manner is peculiarly earnest and dignified to-day. With honored towns-people he sits on the stone bench prepared for him and other local dignitaries. All the people feel that there is something unusual to come before them on this occasion. The judges meet. The case is formally opened. The story of Naomi and Ruth is told. It is known that Naomi has resolved to sell the property which belonged to her deceased husband. The next of kin, according to the old law, has the first advantage in making the purchase. This relative approaches. Boaz in a manly way gives him the opportunity. He seems glad to buy. Perhaps he thought the necessities of Naomi would induce her to part with the estate at a reduced price. This is a trying moment for Boaz; his heart beats fast. Will the kinsman secure the property? Tender hopes balance on the answer to that question, but Boaz must be fair; the offer must be fully made. It must be understood that from Naomi Ruth goes with it. She is its inalienable, its inseparable appurtenant. The case is fully stated. Will the kinsman agree to the terms? Shall he claim Ruth as his own? Oh, Boaz, still thy throbbing heart and listen to the kinsman's answer! The beautiful Ruth, the rose of Moab, is not wanted by this relation. The kinsman will not have the property on these terms. The anonymous relative does not want Ruth as his wife. We cannot tell what his reasons were, but it is certain that he declines to purchase the estate on the conditions named. Noble Boaz, happy Boaz, Ruth shall be all thine own! The people are witnesses; they shout their joy; their hearts [illegible] to heaven in prayer and go out to the bridal pair in blessing. We may not admire the conduct of the kinsman, but we can rejoice in the happiness of Boaz; and we can learn useful lessons from the kinsman's words as recorded in this old story, "Lest I mar mine own inheritance."

When the Property is Bought

Many men mar noble inheritances. We have here suggested for us a practical subject to whose discussion we now give our thought. What are some of these inheritances, and how may they be marred? We may notice, in the [illegible] spoke of a sound mind in a sound body as one of the best gifts of the gods. Nowhere does the Word of God, rightly translated, speak of the body as vile; everywhere does the Bible [illegible] workmanship. The interpretation of the Bible which makes it degrade the body is false to [illegible] to God, the author of the Bible, the Former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits. The man who sins against his body sins against his God. God has written his will upon the body as truly as upon the pages of the Bible. Every natural motion of the body is a revelation of the will and purpose of the divine Creator. It was a heathen, and not a Christian conception which in the minds of recluses and fanatics, of hermits and monks, has led to the laceration of the body in the hope that thereby God would be honored and the soul ennobled. Ever since Christ was cradled in the manger in Bethlehem the body has been honored, exalted, and glorified. Every babe since the birth of Christ has been in a sense divinized. As his incarceration was the humanizing of the divine, so in some sense it was the divinizing of the human. As a young man in the dew of eternal youth, he sits now on the right hand of God in a glorified human body. He carried that body with him to his cross, to his grave, and to his throne. It bore the marks of the cross after his resurrection. It was supported by needful food, and now glorified it is exalted to the throne of the universe. The man who expects to honor God by dishonors alike the creature and the Creator. Ever since the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost the body has been the temple of the third Person of the Trinity. We distinctly read, "Ye are the temple of the Holy Ghost." Shall a man dare destroy, dishonor, or pollute the temple of the Holy Ghost? The man who overworks his body sins against God. The man who by intemperance in eating or drinking unfits his body for discharging its normal functions, degrades himself and dishonors the Almighty. Intemperance even in lawful indulgence is to be rebuked as a degrading sin against the most wonderful mechanism known among men and as a defiant crime against God, the author of this matchless machine. Indulgence, laziness, and selfishness are sins against health, happiness, and God. No man has a right to overwork, to over-eat, or to practice undue indulgence in rest or in rightful enjoyment. The man who sins against the simple economy of health has taken the crown from the brow of manhood and has at the same time defied the laws of the Almighty.

It is true that many men with broken bodies have accomplished wonderful results in life. The names of John Calvin, Robert Hall, and a score more suggest themselves as illustration of this truth. Let no man be discouraged who has inherited a weak body. Great souls have often dwelt in frail tenements until the tired body was laid to rest in the grave and the great soul went up in triumph to God. But let those who have received the inheritance of physical health prize it as one of the great gifts of God. Let them care for it as one of the sacred inheritances of life, and let them lay it as a willing offering at the feet of the Lord's Christ. In the case of many men sickness is often a reflection on their good sense if not on their moral character. There is a glorious sense in which Christ heals our diseases as truly as he forgives our iniquities; there is a blessed truth in the affirmation that he came to bear our sickness as truly as our sinfulness, and there is an unspeakable inspiration in the certainty that in heaven none of the inhabitants shall ever be sick. Let every man emphatically say, "no," when tempted to violate the laws of God in his own body, adding with this unknown kinsman, "Lest I mar mine own inheritance."

The Heritage of Mind.

There is also the inheritance of intellectual capabilities. Of course there are great differences among men in these respects. But in our day ignorance is not simply a misfortune; it is a crime. Christian men must develop all their faculties to their highest possibilities. All that they have and are belong to Jesus Christ. No man has a right to be an intellectual dwarf. Every man is bound by the most sacred of obligations to make the most of himself for time and for eternity. What a man is intellectually here will determine to some degree what he will be intellectually hereafter. The world to come is but the developed results of present conditions or attainments; that world is but the ripened fruit of the intellectual and moral seed sown in this life. Every Christian, because inspired by a sense of loyalty to Jesus Christ, will desire to develop his intellectual powers to their utmost degree. He cannot but wish to possess numerous and varied mental faculties for the salvation of men and for the greater glory of the Lord Jesus. He must because of his sonship with God enlarge to their utmost capacity all his mental faculties.

Christianity tends greatly to produce this result. True religion appeals to true reason. God summons our reasoning faculties to their fullest exercise and to their noblest achievement. When God's thoughts come into men's hearts they stimulate their own thoughts to active exercise and to Harmonious Development.

Divine love in human hearts puts enlarged brain into human heads. Religion stimulates every noble faculty of the soul. It consecrates and inspires poetic genius, and it lays its ennobling touch upon every logical faculty. Divine love made John Bunyan the immortal dreamer; it made Samuel Bradburn, one of the great workers and orators in his Church, a man of whom Dr. Abel Stevens said that "during forty years Samuel Bradburn was esteemed the Demosthenes of Methodism; it made William Carey a profound scholar, a lofty thinker, a consecrated toiler, and an inspired genius. Christianity adorns culture with true symmetry and highest beauty, and culture in turn gives Christianity its fullest beauty and its grandest opportunity. They ought never to be separated. Each sweetly and divinely ministers to the other.

Let no young man or woman neglect wide reading, careful study and earnest thought. Young Christians should be model students. They have Jesus Christ for their teacher and the noblest men and women in the world as their fellow pupils. No man can so securely walk the dizzy heights of intellectual greatness as he who has sat in lowliest reverence at the feet of the Lord Jesus. He is the world's great teacher. The school of Christ is the noblest university. Arise, oh young men and women, to your dignity as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Take advantage of every opportunity for intellectual culture, and then let the love of Christ sanctify that culture to his glory. Intellectual indolence is a sin against our noble nature and against the great God, the world's foremost thinker and your own Creator and Redeemer. When tempted to intellectual slothfulness ring out an emphatic refusal lest you mar your inheritance of noble intellectual possibilities. You ought to surpass all ungodly men and women along every line of intellectual attainment and noble endeavor.

The Family Name.

There is also the inheritance of a worthy family history. This is a great, an unspeakable gift. It is a gift above the worth of all mere financial values. A good name is more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold. A good name is the ripe product of years of noble ancestral character. There is, whatever may be said to the contrary, much in blood. It is quite true that a man cannot on heraldic crutches strut across the stage of life, so as to secure the respect of thinking men. We insist in these days upon having worth in men themselves. We ask not so much who their grandfather was, nor what he did; but who they themselves are and what they can do. Nevertheless, what a man is and what he can do will depend in no small degree upon who his grandfather was and what he did. There is often an esprit de corps in a noble family history which is influential in preserving its nobility. It takes years to acquire a worthy character, either as a personal possession or as a business influence; but when possessed its value is inestimably great.

There is a vast difference between character and reputation. Reputation is what men think we are, character is what God knows us to be. Reputation is seeming;

Character is Being.

Reputation is the breath of men; character is the inbreathing of the eternal God. One may for a time have a good reputation and a bad character, or the reverse; but not for long. What is in will come out. It is impossible for any man long to play the hypocrite. No man falls suddenly, except in the eyes of his fellow men. The man who falls has long been leaning in the eyes of God. It is indescribably sad that a man after years of noble living may in an hour ruin both reputation and character. It is sad that many sons mar the value of a worthy family history. They drag down their father's name into the mire of their own vileness. They break the heart of their mother, and discrown the gray head of their father. Is there a man in this house who has wandered from his father's and his mother's God? Is there one who has lowered the standard of a noble family life and history? Is there one who is besmirching his name and staining his character by unholy thoughts and impure acts? In the name of that worthy family history, in the name of an ideal family life, in the name of the great God and Father of us all, I beseech you to stop and to stop now. You are marring your own inheritance.

It is a blessed thing to be able to give a noble family inheritance to one's children. Almost all that many of us can give our children will be a worthy name. Almost all that any of us can ever expect to possess in this world will be a good name. Let us carefully guard it; let us sacredly preserve it; let us continually honor it; let us never so live that our children shall be ashamed of the name they bear. But let us send it down to them as an honored inheritance to which they shall add honors for all the generations to come. Such a name is worth more than bonds or gold. Many a man would rather have honest poverty than dishonest wealth. A little time ago in this city in a professional man's office a man of wealth was ashamed to give his name. His father had dishonored that name. Men's sins go down to the third and fourth generation still. Many men sin against their children by making them heirs of disease and dishonor. God pity such children! God have mercy on such parents!

The Spiritual Heritage.

There is also, in the last place, the inheritance of religious possibilities. Intellectual attainments and religious experiences cannot be transmitted to our children. We can transmit our vices but, strictly speaking, not our virtues. We can transmit our sins but not our graces. There is a sense, however, in which we can transmit tendencies toward good and God or toward evil and the devil. There is a divine truth in much that is said regarding heredity in our day. It is much for a man to be able to say "my father's God;" it is vastly easier for such a man to say, "my Lord and my God" after having been taught to say "my father's God." Children of Christian men and women stand upon a vastly higher plane of possibility than the children of ungodly men and women. The time may come when the natural will be much more like the supernatural than as we now see it. Indeed, there ought to be no distinction between the natural and supernatural. God is active in all spheres of nature.

The possibility of being translated out of the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son ought to be realized in early childhood. No man, however far he may go into sin, can shake off entirely the influences of a godly parentage and of early religious training. These influences will follow him in all his departures from the God of his father and mother. They will arrest his thought in his moments of sin, and they will be present both to rebuke and to inspire him in his ways of penitence. Early religious training becomes an inseparable part of the soul's essential life. During the last week I talked with a man who had just recovered from a period of dissipation, and with broken voice and moist eyes, he said, "how could I so far forget myself, so greatly dishonor my sainted parents, and so wickedly disobey my father's God?" Oh, children of God's children, prize your privileges. Oh, realize your possibilities. Oh, make their God your God and your portion forevermore.

Out of his historic obscurity comes this kinsman of Naomi, and into this obscurity he passes again: but he has left on record which for three thousand years has been uttering its wholesome suggestions. Regarding all these inheritances that we have named let this anonymous kinsman give us instruction and suggestion this morning. With a fuller meaning than he could have known let us refuse to obey the promptings of evil companions, the suggestions of our own corrupt hearts, and the temptations of Satan lest we mar our noble, our immortal, our divine inheritance.

It is possible for us to rise on stepping-stones of our dead selves to wondrous heights of Christian attainment. It is a profoundly solemn thought that our lives are to be lived over again in laying foundations for the generations yet to come. In Ruth, the Rose of Moab, part of the Gentile strain of blood came into the life of Christ. Each one of us may in a more real sense make our lives a part of his and his life a part of ours. We may become partakers of the divine nature. God grant that we may never mar any part of our glorious, our immortal, our divine inheritance.

Indian Lepers and the Gospel.

The Story of Mukinda, the First Man to be Baptized in his Village.

IN the little village of Undirgraw, in the Sholapur District, India, writes a missionary, was a man named Mukinda. Like his father he was a man of considable influence, and was the leading man in a "panch," or advisory council, for twenty seven villages. In 1887, when about forty years old, he became a Christian. He was the first person who was baptized in his village. His wife was very much afraid of his new religion, and thought that she would be compelled to be baptized. She ran away, but he went after her, and overtook her before she had reached her father's village, and brought her back, and she lived with him very happily until he died. Several months after his baptism, signs of leprosy appeared. He was told that it was because he had become a Christian, and was strongly urged to turn back to Hinduism. His wife tried to have him worship Hindu gods, but he utterly refused to do it himself, or allow her to do it for him. These temptations and the advance of the disease only brought him nearer to his Lord.

After his conversion he learned to read, and the Bible was his constant companion until his death. He greatly enjoyed reading it to others. A Hindu priest once came and stayed several days in the "chowdi" near Mukinda's house. He made a great ado about saying his prayers, and many persons assembled to hear him. On one of these occasions Mukinda took down his New Testament and read to them Christ's teachings about prayer as given in the sixth chapter of Matthew. He was faithful in exhorting his friends and neigbors to become Christians, and used his influence to keep up a Christian school in the village, giving his own house for this purpose for many years without charge. One of his children was baptized and is now living with her husband. The other members of the family have not come out, but seem not far from the kingdom. The missionary adds:

"The day before his death, his pastor held the following conversation with him—'Are you ready to go and meet your Lord?' 'Yes, I am ready.' 'Has the Lord forgiven your sins?' 'Yes, I have great joy in this thought.' 'Has he given you peace?' 'Yes, I have perfect peace.' 'Do you feel that you know your Lord fully?' 'Yes, I know him, and he knows me.' 'What evidences have you of this?' 'When the family are all asleep I sometimes wake up and pray. At such times my Lord comes and stands beside me in a beautiful form and in a low sweet voice talks with me, and I have great joy.' (As he said this, tears of joy ran down his cheeks.) 'Do you not feel troubled in any way?' 'I am not troubled,' and there is no reason to do so, for my Lord has said, 'Let not your heart be troubled.' And he continued the quotation to the words, 'Where I am there ye may be also.'

"The next day he called his family and said: 'I want you all to become Christians, for the Lord has given his life for you. Take heed to your ways, and give your hearts to God quickly. And now you all go away and leave me alone and when I am dead let none but Christians touch my body, and do not bury me where the heathen are buried.'

"These were the last words of one who was a witness to the triumphant power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. His life and words will long be remembered in his village. May the Lord multiply the number of such witnesses."

COUNT ZINZENDORF'S HOLY COMPACT.

COUNT ZINZENDORF was a man of high family, on whose estates the Moravians settled. He became so much in love with them that he joined with them. In his student days he formed an association of young men, called the "Grain of Mustard Seed," a touching name for a society which has done good work. Their crest was a shield bearing the "Ecce homo," with the words, "His wounds are healing." Their motto was, "We will love the whole human family." On his wedding-day Count Zinzendorf made a compact with his bride that she should be ready at any moment to go into any part of the world as a missionary. "Our home shall be in that part of the world where we can work best for the Lord Jesus." Zinzendorf said he took as his motto, I have one passion and one alone; it is 'he and he alone.'" When Count Zinzendorf was appealing to his converts and hearers, the two first missionaries that went out from the Moravians were so moved by his words that they went to him and said they wished to go to St. Thomas. But there was no way of getting there except in the slave vessels, and they wished to be sold as slaves so that they might work among the other slaves for the Lord Jesus.

HIS GLORY.

The tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory.—Exodus 29: 43

SO let it be, as in that far-off land
Three thousand years ago that promise came.
'Tis good to-day as when 'mid desert sand
It was endorsed by the unchanging name,
Though centuries have swept this weary vale
His arm is strong and his touch cannot fail.

Out of the darkness, and the world's wild strife,
The Lord had lifted his own house once more.
When men have patience neath the surgeon's knife [o'er.
Comes their reward, at last when pain is Now for the promise, since we have been tried,
"The tabernacle shall be sanctified."

Forth from its courts may many arrows go
Full barbed with love and reach time-hardened hearts.
May earth's far regions to their welfare know
That God keeps near whoever else departs.
Silent, but certain, ready now as then,
To voice his mercy through the lips of men.

Yet much remains for all of us to heed,
Shall not the Master find a proper home?
The husbandman cares not to sow his seed
On ground unbroken, hoping fruit may come
'Tis ours in deep humility to meet [plete.
The promised blessing with a faith com-

A royal princess greets our shores in peace,
And life is starved to show her honor due,
A King has promised to our faith's increase
A greater glory—now let us be true,
Garnish with love, let all the timbrels ring,
And make the palace fitting for the King.

DEDICATION HYMN.

TO thee and for thy worship, Lord,
This house we dedicate.
Do thou for such a sacred work
Our spirits consecrate.

Fulfil the promise long ago,
To thy disciples given;
So shall this be "the house of God,
The very gate of heaven."

Thou said'st, "Wherever two or three
Are gathered in my name,
And for my sake, yea, there shall I
Be in the midst or them."

What tho' no glory fill the house,
And no Shekinah flame,
Help us to feel that thou art here,
And magnify thy name.

May faith perceive thee ever near,
In church, at home, abroad,
Until we reach that temple, where
The pure in heart see God.

ADVENT PARABLES.

The Warnings Given by Christ Under the Symbols of the Fig Tree and Days of Noah

BY REV. THOMAS NEWBERRY.*

THERE is no outward sign connected with the return of the Lord Jesus Christ to receive his people to himself. The Master of the household has left his house and commanded the porter to watch, and would have his servants wait for their Lord, that they may open immediately to him, needing no warning. Yet there are tokens of a spiritual nature which we do well to observe. We have an illustration in the fig tree, whose branches are brittle in the winter, having no sap, but as spring advances, and the sap rises, the branches are no longer brittle, but become tender and moist, giving evidence of the approaching summer.

We have tokens in certain principles which operate slowly at first, but continue to gather strength. Lawlessness, departure from the faith in those who are guardians of the faith, a spirit of delusion and doubt. We see and know that the day of God's longsuffering draws to its close, and the day of vengeance of our God is near, even at the doors. For the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the last days perilous times shall come (see Epistles Peter and Jude).

Taking the fig tree as an emblem of the Jewish nation, after the apathy of centuries, the softening of Jewish prejudices and rising inquiry concerning the truths of Christianity may surely be taken as an encouraging indication that Israel's summer time is nigh at hand, when there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer who shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

We read in Psa. 110, Jehovah said unto David's Lord, "Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool." Meanwhile he is waiting in expectancy until his enemies be put beneath his feet, and the kingdoms of this world become his. (Psalm 2.) But, whilst he is waiting for his throne and his kingdom, there is another object of expectancy still dearer to his heart. He is waiting for his Bride, composed of all those who have been given him by the Father for whom he laid down his life, and who are now being prepared by the Comforter.

The parable of the days of Noah is twofold in its application. Two periods are mentioned. The days which were before the the flood, which are connected with the world; and the day when Noah entered into the ark, when the eight souls were shut in by God. And we find from Gen. 7, that a period of seven days elapsed after Noah entered in before the flood. Very suggestive is it of the last week of Daniel's seventy weeks which will intervene between the removal of the Church and the execution of judgment on the world. As in the days which were before the flood, when the Spirit of God was striving with men, they took no heed of the prophecies of Enoch and Noah, reckoning upon the uniformity of nature, which showed no sign of change; so in these last days there are mockers saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" (II. Pet. 3: 3-7.) "So shall also the coming of the Son of Man be."

Concerning the time which corresponds with the day when "Noah entered into the ark," the Lord said, "Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left." The coming of the Lord to receive his own will be simultaneous throughout the whole world; it may be midnight in one part, two men sleeping in one bed, the one taken, caught up to meet the Lord in the air, the other left (Luke 17: 34); it may be midday in another, two men laboring in the field, the one taken, the other left; in another quarter it may be the early morn, two women preparing the daily meal, the one taken to be forever with the Lord, the other left with the prospect of the times of Antichrist and the great tribulation.

The Lord foretells that the world will continue its heedless course, as in the days of Noah, up to the time of his coming to take his church; and after that, without heeding the warning given, will continue the same worldly career, until for the execution of judgment the Son of Man shall come. But to his waiting, believing people his word of exhortation is, "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

GOD'S CALL.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing July 2. Acts 16: 10; II Timothy 1: 9-13

WHAT is God's call? How does it reach the human ear? In Paul's case, he saw in a dream a man of Macedonia asking him to come and help his people. Where was this man? We find no trace of him subsequently. When Paul went to Macedonia, he does not appear to have found this man waiting to welcome him. Neither at the entrance to the city, nor at the place "where prayer was wont to be made," did the man appear. In fact the people of Macedonia made it very clear that they did not want any help from Paul by complaining of his officious interference to the magistrates and getting him beaten and locked up in prison. Are we then to conclude that the Apostle was mistaken? There must have been many among his contemporaries who thought so; and not only mistaken in going to Macedonia, but mistaken in his whole life. What did he get by all his labor and travel and hardship? Why should he not have married and settled down and enjoyed life? A man of his standing and eloquence might have made a success of life. He might have made a large fortune and had a place in the synagogue. Instead of doing so, he spent his life in going from place to place, teaching and preaching and, as in Macedonia, trying to help people who did not want his help. Some of our preachers and leaders who are perpetually impressing on young people the duty of amassing wealth and rising in the world and preaching the "Gospel of getting on," must often think that Paul made a mistake in life. Yet Paul, when he was near death, and admitting how much he had suffered, declared, "Nevertheless, I am not ashamed." He had heard a call to the work and he had obeyed it. This man of Macedonia was no fiction of his brain. He really represented the unconscious needs of his people. Though they were not asking Paul's help, they needed just what he had to impart. It is so to-day. The man whom we meet on the street, the man who lives near us, the man with whom we transact business does not ask us to tell him of Jesus. He may be quite satisfied with his life; the only need he may feel is for more money, or for less harass. Yet if our eyes were as keen and our ears as open as the Apostle, the representative of such chance acquaintances might be seen by us in a vision asking for our help. We know that they need the Gospel; we know how their souls would be quickened by it and their lives illumined by it. Possibly if we sought to give them this help we should be repulsed, as Paul was; but our duty is not dependent on the reception of the message. The deep, yearning love for souls which glowed in the Apostle's heart would help men in their own despite. He could wish himself accursed if only in that way could others be blessed. In their need and in our [illegible] of the sole means of supplying it, [illegible]call. No vision may come to our dull [illegible], but the call is going up hourly and we [illegible] of it.

A GERMAN Y. M. C. A.

WE are indebted to our friend, Mr. John F. Pieper of Quincy, Ill., for a photograph of the new Young Men's Christian Association Building now being erected for the German young men of that city. The photograph was made from the architect's plans and is reproduced on this page. The Association had its origin in a visit which a number of young men from St. Louis paid to Quincy a little over a [illegible] branches in that city and some of the members, knowing how large a German population there is in Quincy were anxious that a German Y. M. C. A. should be organized there. The suggestion met with immediate response. [illegible] from the outset. Within the year, nearly three hundred members joined and took active interest in the work. Much spiritual good was done and the prospects grew brighter from week to week. Early this year a movement was inaugurated for the erection of a building, that the Association might own its own home. Nine public-spirited citizens joined Mr. Pieper in giving five thousand dollars in equal shares as a beginning for the building fund. A number of others gave two hundred dollars each, and others one hundred and smaller sums. By the time the plans were prepared there was $12,000 in the treasury and the committee felt justified in authorising the erection of a twenty thousand dollar edifice. On June 12 the cornerstone was laid with appropriate ceremonies and, by the end of the year, the Association has good reason to hope that it will have the pleasure of holding a reception in the new building.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Indianapolis district has been holding its second annual convention. The exercises occupied the whole day from the early morning until late at night. There had been a meeting for special prayer the previous evening and intense earnestness was manifested there which continued throughout the convention. The meetings were held in the Locust Street Church, with the promise that the next convention will be at the Blackford Street Church. Dr. Locust of Terre Haute, Dr. H. A. Buchtel and Rev. L. F. Dimmit took part in the proceedings.——The Rev. Irwin H. Correll, of Japan, sends to the Epworth Herald a most encouraging report of good work being done by the League in that land. Most of the members are students in the University, but they find time for religious work. They have rented several preaching places, where large audiences are gathered and occasionally they have seen evidences of the progress being made, in the hostility of the enemy who sets the law in motion against them, breaking up their meetings by the aid of the police and inducing the owners o. the premises by threats and intimidation to refuse them accommodation. The ladies of the League have taken hold of the Sunday School work organized some time ago by the Women's Foreign Missionary Society and have made it a League work. They have now eleven Sunday Schools in active operation and are doing much to disarm the prejudice against Christianity.——York, Neb., was the scene of an enthusiastic gathering a few days ago. It was the second annual convention of the League of the Nebraska Conference. Nearly three days were filled with delightful meetings full of spirit and enthusiasm. The convention re-elected President L. O. Jones for another year, A. L. Jones was elected Secretary; Miss Hattie Crow, Corresponding Secretary and Miss Mattie Hewett, Treasurer. Among the speakers at the various meetings were Presiding Elder Duke Slavens, Rev. J. F. Kempner, Dr. Charles B. Mitchell, Rev. J. D. M. Buckner, Dr. J. F. Polk and Dr. B. L. Paine.

A CANADIAN CIRCLE.

A VERY interesting report of the work being done by a circle of King's Daughters in Toronto, is sent by Miss Julia E. Austen to the Silver Cross. She writes: Ours is the "Whatsoever" Circle and it would be impossible to enumerate all the helpful services it has rendered In His Name. The regular meetings after the formal opening, in which every member takes part, are devoted to sewing for the poor. A large number of parcels of clothing have been given to poor families, both for men, women and children. We have helped cases brought to our notice by the nursing at Home Mission, especially one case in which the woman was brought to the Saviour through the kindness she received at our hands. We have made a mother's bag, in which are a complete outfit for mother and child and a change of bed linen. To one family alone we have given 100 articles of clothing. To the Night Shelter we have given 19 articles of clothing and 19 articles in crockery and tinware for the kitchen of the Shelter. Our most interesting work is another, which has brought most joy to our hearts. We became acquainted with Mrs. Eldridge of Bear Cave Mission, Muskoka, who had gone out to that barren place with her family, and started, amid much opposition and ridicule, a Mission. Time and space will not allow me to tell of her unwavering trust in God's providence, and how little by little she managed to get a place built to worship in; but when she left us in March, after visiting here for two months, it was with boxes overflowing with clothes, toys, and books, and a heart full of joy and gratitude to her Heavenly Father. Our Circle gave 10 lamps and brackets, 3 chairs for the platform costing $16.62, other small wares costing about $7 and a box of groceries costing $8; the husband of one member gave her $8 for a stove for the Mission room. Besides this, we sold several articles of our own manufacture and with the proceeds paid Mrs. Eldridge's fare back to Muskoka.

A meeting of the Societies of Christian Endeavor of Salt Lake City, Utah, was held recently in the Mormon Tabernacle. Mr. John G. Woolley the famous temperance orator was the speaker of the evening. His address was heard with rapt attention.

The Y.M.C.A. of Dublin, Ireland, is holding open-air services in Phœnix Park. A worker writes: "We had sixty-two helpers out at a meeting last night in the park. Large numbers assembled to listen to the Gospel. What a change rom the past! No excitement and no noise; God was with us in power."

The number of Young Men's Christian Associations in colleges is increasing and there is an increase in the membership of the older college Associations. Yale leads with 805, Princeton is next with 580, and Cornell next with 434. The others in order are Toronto, Ohio Normal, Ohio Wesleyan, McGill, John Hopkins, Iowa State and Mount Hermon School.

Mr. Jue Hawk, the Christian Chinaman who delivered an inspiring address at the Christian Endeavor Convention in New York last year, was to have spoken at the Convention in Montreal. He has, however, been obliged to decline, as under the iniquitous Geary law he might be prevented returning to this country if he went to Canada. He is at present conducting a successful mission work among the Chinese at Portland, Oregon.

Ladies who may travel alone during the summer would find it a convenience to have the Addresses of the Young Women's Christian Associations in the various towns they may visit. For their convenience a little pocket guide has been published by the Y. W. C. A. of Philadelphia, which gives the address and name of the Secretary of every Y. W. C. A. in the United States and Canada. It may be obtained for three cents or $1. a hundred of Miss Sarah Cabury, 1518 Arch St., Philadelphia.

The King's Daughters who are trying to raise $2500 to complete the endowment of a perpetual free bed in New York Infirmary report in the Silver Cross that up to the date of going to press seventy-nine dollars had been received. The bed is for sick daughters of the King wherever they may hail from. The endowment is $5,000, but a benevolent lady has offered to pay one half if the circles will raise the other half.

WE shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

Eastern Recreations.

Amusements of the Young Orientals Quite as Diversified as our own—Child Plays and Frolics—The "Dancing Bear."

GO where you will, even to the most distant parts of the globe, childhood retains its distinctive features and amusements. In the East, the little folks of the oldest countries pass their leisure in much the same kind of merry, innocent frolic that is the delight of American boys and girls. The lot of the children of Syria, notwithstanding the somewhat grave countenances of their elders, is by no means an unhappy one. Hardly a town or village in Palestine is destitute of its village green or playground, where the juveniles gather for play or prattle. At rare intervals, there comes along an attraction that stirs up the whole village, adults as well as little folks, and all are children for the time being. It may be a party of rough, skin-clad mountaineers with a dancing bear, or if the town be of considerable size, it may even be that perennial delight of American girls and boys, "the circus." Such a treat, however, is rare in the East, and and when it does come, furnishes grateful remembrance for a lifetime.

Some of the mountain-dwellers of Syria, who dislike the laborious life of field-workers, take up animal training as a means of livelihood. In this they are remarkably successful, taming and training donkeys, goats, bears and monkeys, and even snakes and tigers, and frequently developing astonishing intelligence on the part of the brutes. Our illustration shows a party of these professional amusement caterers, with a dancing bear. The latter is taught to caper about to music, to hold a long, ponderous club, to wrestle, and to imitate the gestures of a beggar when the play is over, and the audience dispersing. These people fare moderately well in the country, but do even better in the city where they stand before the coffee shops with their crowds of habitues, where each gives what he can.

Among the juvenile amusements in Syria are many that correspond with those familiar in our own land. Instead of "marbles," the little Orientals play with spheres of baked clay which they call "gullehs;" their skipping-rope exercise is the "hably," leap-frog is "natta," ball play, indeed all that relates to the ball, is "tabeh," and the dolls of the little girls are "luab." There is a game played with the bones of the sheep, which is designated as "kaab." Little toy ploughs, into which cats or kittens are playfully harnessed, are "sikkeh," and the pet lambs so common among children in agricultural or grazing regions are "charouf." These and a hundred other illustrations might be cited to show that the little people of the Orient are just as fond of play and frolic as their compeers the world over.

One Girl's Consecration.

IN the latter part of the last century a girl in England became a kitchen maid in a farm-house. She had many styles of labor, and much hard work. Time passed on and she married the son of a weaver of Halifax. They were industrious. They saved money enough after a time to build them a home. On the morning of the day when they were to enter that home, the young wife rose at four o'clock, entered the front yard, knelt down, consecrated the place to God, and there made the solemn vow: "O Lord, if thou wilt bless me in this place the poor shall have a share of it."

Time rolled on and fortune rolled in. Children grew up around them, and they became prosperous; one, a member of parliament, in a public place declared that his success came from that prayer of his mother in the door-yard. All of them were wealthy—four thousand hands in their factories. They built dwelling houses for laborers at cheap rents, and when they were invalided and could not pay, they had the houses for nothing. One of these sons went to America, admired the parks, went back, bought land and opened a great public park and made it a present to the city of Halifax, England. They endowed an orphanage and they endowed two alms-houses. All England has heard of the generosity and good works of the Crossleys.

Moral: consecrate to God your small means and humble surroundings, and you will have larger means and grander surroundings.

Needless Fault-finding.

IN a mothers' meeting not long ago, writes Ella Rockwood, the question came up for discussion whether it was better for mothers to overlook slight faults than to notice them every time. Among others who took part in the discussion was an unmarried lady who happened to be present. She said: "You have all heard of 'old maids' children' being better governed than other people's, and so, perhaps, will smile at my offering advice upon the subject. But I have known of a number of instances among my married friends where the habit of fault-finding was productive of such bad results that I would like to tell you about them.

"One, in particular, was a lady of exceeding neatness in her housekeeping, who was a neighbor of mine, and who was the mother of two boys. From the time they were old enough to play about the floor their mother's excessive neatness made their lives anything but pleasant to them. As they grew older the mother's vigilance did not relax. Her children's comfort, and her husband's as well, was a secondary consideration to neatness and order. It was 'Don't do this' and 'Don't do that,' from morning till night. Is it any wonder that those boys grew up to dislike their home.

"This may be an exceptional case," said the lady, "but it has brought me to see it in such a light that if I had children of my own to bring up, I should certainly be, if anything, too lenient with them, rather than run the risk of the effect of constant unreasonable fault-finding." The mothers of children grown to manhood and womanhood are unanimous in agreeing that if they had their littles ones back again they would be more lenient with them, and in the light of advancing years they can see where they think their children are now too much given to fault-finding with their own little ones.

MORE REAPERS.

O STILL in accents sweet and strong
Sounds forth the ancient word,
More reapers for the harvest fields,
More laborers for the Lord.

We hear the call; in dreams no more,
In selfish ease we lie,
But girded for our Father's work,
Go forth beneath the sky.

Where prophets' words and martyrs' blood
And prayers of saints are sown,
We, to their labors enter in,
Would reap where they have sown.

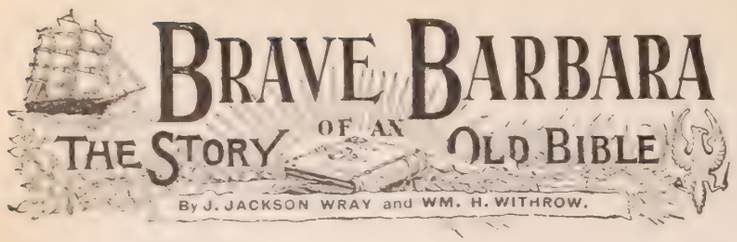
DOCTORS' WORRIES.

PHYSICIANS have so many hardships, so many interruptions, so many annoyances, I am glad they have so many encouragements. All doors open to them. They are welcome to mansion and to cot. Little children shout when they see them coming down the road, and the aged, recognizing the step, look up and say, "Doctor, is that you?" They stand between our families and the grave, fighting back the troops of disorder that come up from their encampment by the cold river. No one hears such thanks as the doctor hears. They are eyes to the blind, they are feet to the lame, their path is strewn with the benedictions of those whom they have befriended. One day there was a dreadful foreboding in our house. All hope was gone. The doctor came four times that day. The children put away their toys and all walked on tiptoe, and at the least sound said, "Hush!" How loudly the clock did tick, and how the banister creaked though we tried to keep it so still. That night the doctor stayed all night. He concentrated all his skill upon the sufferer. At last the restlessness of the sufferer subsided in a calm, sweet slumber, and the doctor looked up and smiled and said: "The crisis is passed." When propped up with pillows, in the easy chair, she sat, and the south wind tried to blow a rose-leaf into the faded cheek, and the children brought flowers—the one, a red clover top; the other, a violet from the lawn—to the lap of the convalescent, and Bertha stoood on a high chair with a brush smoothing her mother's hair, and we were told in a day or two she might ride out, joy came back to our house.

And as we helped the old country doctor into his gig, we noticed not that the step was broken, or the horse stiff in the knees, and we all realized for the first time in our life what doctors were worth. Encourage them. They deserve every kindness at our hands.



CHAPTER XV.

A FAMILY PROBLEM.

NOW, Mrs. Pemberton, even in her palatial home and amid her lavish and pleasureful surroundings in Virginia, had known something of the peace that passeth knowledge, the "luxury of love" that come only through the channel of the lifted Cross. But she had found it hard to hold her own in the godly race, and harder still to induce her dignified and gentlemanly husband, and his fine militant sons to see things from her standpoint, a standpoint which is really no standing-point at all, but a place low-lying at the Master's feet.

She often wept for this, and lived and prayed for it; that her noble husband and her glorious boys might be brought to see that there was something better than military glory, something better than social honors, something better than land and gold, the love of Jesus, the inspiration of Christly duty, as the highest gifts of God. So the sweet-souled, timid, retiring, and delicately constituted woman lived and prayed, and hoped that somehow, somewhere, in some way, some strange way if it were needed, she might see the fulfilment of the one desire of her heart—her husband, her sons, her daughters, all sitting at the feet of Jesus. Was it for this, that they were uprooted from their dear Virginian home? Was it for this that they were "drawn into the wilderness?" Yes, she does not know it yet, but Barbara is there to greet her and God hath gone before to prepare the way.

It was not long before the Hecks and the Emburys were close friends with the family of the Virginian ex-cavalier. John Lawrence, and Paul Heck, and Lucky Mike, had all offered willing service to the Pembertons in the matter of wood-felling, roof-rearing, and corn-sowing. These services had been warmly and gratefully accepted, and between the younger men, especially, a close fellowship had accrued. Barbara speedily discovered that Mrs. Pemberton was a "sister beloved," and with the comely and gracious Quakeress, Hannah Whiteside, these three formed a trio of mutual helpfulness and counsel dear to each heart. Mary Lawrence would gladly have made this into a quartette, but the young wife was again engrossed by sweet mother cares, and could but be an occasional visitor in the sweet symposium.

It is very noteworthy how such a life tends to lower, and even to ignore, the differences of rank, calling, social position, tribe, and all the rest of the conventional distinctions that make men unequal, and plant so many mischiefs everywhere. Lucky Mike with his sterling honesty and happy humor was welcomed everywhere; Tookalusca and Ooloona were free of a meal, or at a social gathering; and the negroes were welcomed at the houses of the Hecks and Lawrences with freedom and delight.

Perhaps the one exception to all this was the case of Col. Pemberton. He was, or had been, a soldier, an officer, a magistrate, had "blue blood" in his veins, and was withal an aristocrat, to the manner born. He was ever a courteous gentleman, but he was somewhat reserved, a little inclined to stand upon his dignity; a strict disciplinarian, and without a particle of sympathy with Methodists, Puritans, Quakers or anybody else whose religion was not cast in conventional mould. How was this "perfect gentleman" to be brought into harmony with his new surroundings? How could he and Brave Barbara, honest Paul Heck, and plain-spoken John Lawrence be "brought into line," to say nothing of "those Quaker people, whose creed consists in looking and which marked the gentle lassie made a profound impression on the susceptible southern temperament of Reginald Pemberton, the gallant colonel's youngest and, it was said, favorite son. How it came about nobody could tell; probably the love-sick young gentleman did not know himself. His passion was very natural and very real; and Gracie was not long in making the discovery, and in finding an honest response to it in her own heart.

The alert and quick perception of Brave Barbara led her to see with true motherly solicitude the unspoken and half unconscious attachment springing up in these young hearts. I think she read their secret before it was thoroughly understood by the young folks themselves. To Barbara the discovery brought much trouble and distress. She fully believed that Reginald was of a noble and manly spirit, of generous character, and strong capability; but she believed that he was ignorant of the great regenerating change which the pious Methodist mother regarded as above all things essential—the "one thing needful" to secure his own true prosperity, and her Gracie's happiness.

Then again, Reginald belonged, as she pondered in her mind, to a proud and aristocratic family, who were alike in their ideas and social standing, emphatically "people of the world." How could they be expected to agree to such a misalliance? How could she and Paul, who preferred to cultivate "heirship of the kingdom of grace" in the alliances they coveted, agree to such a thing? Besides, Brave Barbara herself was quite as proud, in her own way as any Pemberton alive; and she could not brook that union with a child of hers should be considered a condescension, by even the bluest blood in all the land. And so, as I have said, the secret which only she had discovered, but of which she was quite sure, disturbed her mind greatly, and sent her often to the pages of her "talisman," or rather to the faithful "Counsellor," in whom lay her abiding help and trust. In this case, however, my heroine did not find such clear guidance. Satisfactory indications were not forthcoming, and in much trouble of mind, Brave Barbara was led to talk the matter over with her good man Paul.

"I can't help thinking, husband," said she one evening when her young folks were out and about among their neighbors, spending the evening, as their custom was, after the day's work was done, "that young Reginald Pemberton is a good deal more attentive to Gracie than is good for either of them. Have you not seen it yourself, Paul?"

"Nay, nay, dear wife," said Paul, "I can't say that I have; and I fancy that you have small ground for such fond imaginings."

"I think I have though," replied the anxious matron. "The young fellow is mooning around here pretty well half his time."

"Don't you think it's more likely that he comes here to see the boys," said Paul.

"Come to see the boys indeed?" replied Barbara, in a tone that might have been sarcastic if she had been given that way. "Is it to the boys that he brings the nosegays of wild flowers, the baskets of butter-nuts, the blossoms of golden-rod, and the scarlet maple leaves? Was it for the boys he tamed the young racoon he gave to Gracie on her birthday? And is it for them that he manages to time his visits so that they are likely enough to be away?"

"Well, well," said the good-tempered and easy-going Paul. "And where's the harm after all, that you can see in all that? You know that Gracie is but young, and—"

"Young, eh?" said Barbara. "Then what about Kate? I suppose you can't see that she is being spoken for either! Bless the man, I do think you look on both of them as children yet!"

"Why, yes," said Paul, coloring up a little, "I do seem to forget that the days of their childhood are gone by; and I feel as though they wrap themselves so closely round my heart, that I can't think of them as anything else but as two darlings to be loved and cared for. Still, young Reginald has never seemed to act in the way you think."

"Paul, my good man! you're as blind as a bat in the sunlight. I suppose the thing is too evident for you to notice it. True, the boy is so shy that he scarcely ever speaks to her; but he is as content to sit dumb in her presence, as the cat is to bask in the sun."

"But say, dearie, what do you want me to do about it?"

"Do about it?" said Barbara, "why, that's where the trouble is. Can't you tell him not to come so often, or something?"

"Fie, Barbara, fie. Do you think I would be guilty of such a breach of hospitality? Besides I don't think that you, yourself, would desire to cool the happly relationship between the two homes. Leave the two young folks alone, lassie. You will only be putting nonsense into their heads by interfering; and if it is there already, you are likely enough to drive it further in. Gracie is a dear, good girl. I am sure you may trust her innocent heart. She loves her old father yet, better than any other man, I'll warrant it."

The cautious mother, however, made good resolutions on the subject, and determined to warn her bonnie lassie in time.

That very evening, in the golden glow of sunset, Gracie Heck was spinning in the ample "living-room" of the large, rambling wood and shingle farm-house, in which the household dwelt. The light flashed back from the well-scoured tins and burnished brass kettles and candlesticks on the big "dresser," and tinged with bronze the plentiful locks of her glossy hair. It was truly a pretty picture that she made, clad in her simple calico gown, and with a bow of blue ribbon on her breast, as she walked back and forth from her spinning-wheel, now giving it a swift whirl, and then stepping back as she drew out the yarn from the fleecy rolls of wool.

A pretty picture, indeed! Young Reginald Pemberton was exactly of that opinion. He stood at that moment at the open door, holding in his hand a string of beautiful speckled trout, fresh drawn from the sparkling stream that rippled near by. Just at that moment, too, the "young fellow's eyes" were eloquent, and if good Paul Heck had been looking on, he would have agreed with Brave Barbara as to what they could do in the way of "courting."

"Good evening, Mistress Grace," said the young angler. "I've brought a few fish for your mother, that I have just caught in the pool of Braeside Burn."

"O, thank you, very much," said the innocent Gracie. "Mother will be pleased to accept them, I'm sure."

"I am not so very sure," said that venturesome young man, with a modest blush. "Do you know that sometimes I am afraid that I have offended your mother; I don't know how unless she thinks I am idle. You see, I am so fond of my rod and gun. I learned that in old Virginia, and I cannot very easily unlearn it, can I?"

"She won't object to your sport to-day, at any rate," said Gracie, with a bright little laugh. "Do you know, I think mother can fry trout better than anybody else in the world? And then," said she, with a glance that took him captive, though she was not angling for him, "fresh trout is my father's favorite dish."

As she took the angler's acceptable and timely gift into the kitchen, she bade him, in a matter-of-fact, and even peremptory fashion, to take a seat, for that he was bound to join them at the supper-table, and share the goods which the gods, in the shape of rod and hook, had provided. On her return, she said:

"If you have been idle, Master Reginald, you must make amends now, by doing something useful. I have been wanting somebody to hold my yarn while I wind it," and deftly flinging the skein around his proffered hands, she did, what she did not consciously propose to do, bound him more than ever unwindably to her own chariot-wheels.

After Gracie had returned to the "living-room" after committing the string of trout into her mother's keeping, who should come into the kitchen but Lucky Mike, fresh from his work of taking the cows to the byre, and putting matters in the stable and the fowl-yard snug for the night.

Our humorous friend was ready for his supper, and the sight of the long, well-furnished string of fat trout in their sparkling mail of sheeny scales was a peculiarly attractive vision.

"By me faith, misthress, delish, but that's a mighty brave soight for the oyes of av a hungry omadhaun like Master Michael Finnegan from the bogs av Bantry Bay. Will we be afther havin' some av the swate crathurs for supper, Cushla-ma-chree?"

Now, it must be confessed that Brave Barbara received the trout with much unwillingness, and had been silently casting over in her own mind, what to do about them; for the conversation with her husband about the doings of this persistent angler after Gracie, filled her with anxiety and discomfort. Well, Lucky Mike had settled that question for her, and neither judge nor jury could have very well reversed the verdict. The look of happy anticipation that shone like oil in Michael's face, the eloquent gleam of satisfaction that lighted Michael's eyes, and the whole-souled delight that sounded every word and tone of Michael's voice, went straight to the heart of his true and loving friend, Cushla-ma-chree.

"Ay, ay, marry; here's a supper fit for king George himself, Mike, and in the space of a few minutes some of them shall lie on your trencher, my lad. So you may be getting the weapons ready for war!"

So that intricate problem was solved and settled. The trout could not now be declined; they must be accepted, despite the quarter they had come from; and Brave Barbara could not help thinking to herself, that to those who are doing their best to seek the light and to walk in it, Providence uses a good many "talismans" other than the greatest of them all, to fling wide the doors of duty when the time is come.

"An' moight I ask ye, Misthress dear, what good angel has come along with such a plisant god-send to a hungry man?" inquired Mike.

"Why, it's that young Reginald Pemberton," said Barbara, with some little revulsion of tone and feeling. He has been, as usual, at a somewhat idle end, and—"

"More power to his elbow, Misthress, if that's the kind of end he's getting at. A string of the finest av fine throut is both plisant and profitable, surely; an' more betoken that the beginnin' av it is such a handsome and well-favored young gintleman as Misther Reginald."

"May be that sort of way to look at it may commend itself to the humor of a hungry man," said Barbara with still a little coolness, born of a mother's fears. "I could be very willing that he should fool the time away with his rod if only it would divert his steps a little oftener from this house. You talk of a 'good angel' that has brought you a welcome supper, Mike; and I shall not be sorry if his visits, like those of other angels, are 'few and far between.'"

The words were hardly out of her lips before Brave Barbara regretted that they had been spoken. That style of talk was so foreign to her truth-loving, gentle and thoughtful spirit, that the sound of them in her own ears brought their own condemnation. As for Lucky Mike, he was quite taken a-back, and for a few brief moments contented himself by looking at the woman he loved almost to reverent worship, with eloquent, though silent surprise.

"Nay, thin, dear Misthress, agra. Sure that isn't spoken like your own swate self at all, at all. There's no forner young fellow to be found along ayther bank o' the river St. Lawrence for all its thousan' miles, than young Pemberton. Sure I've bethowt me more than wanst or twice that you've given the lad the cowld showlder whin he made his appearance at the Heck far-r-m. An' yit, sure there's no mistakin' in the laste that he's a broth av a bhoy all round; an' my heart's been sorry to see the look on his face when you've chilled off the pleasant glow from his honest face. Forgive me, Cushla-ma-chree," continued the speaker with strong feeling and plaintive tone, "but I should be Onlucky Mike agin if I didn't try to win a warm look an' a kind wilcome for the lad. Belave me he is more of an aingel than you think, and you'll remimber, Misthress, dear, what the Best of good Books says about intertainin' angels at unawares."

Lucky Mike's warm-hearted and eloquent pleading had instant and gratifying effect. Somehow she felt that he was right, and that she was wrong. She turned her expressive grey eyes on him with the look that had many times sent satisfaction unto his heart, and said: "All right, Mike, your angel shall spread his wings in this direction whenever it pleases him, and fold them at Heck farm whenever—"

"Gracie chooses to give the gossoon a welcome," said Mike, completing the sentence; but Brave Barbara had already passed into the "living-room."

"I am playing the part of Hercules with Omphale," said the self-conscious Reginald, blushing, and looking on Barbara's face with an anxiously inquiring eye, "but I can succeed better at my own work of holding the plough, or of handling the fishing-rod and gun."

"The first of those employments is the more profitable, I wot," said Barbara, "in a new country like this. Nevertheless," she hastened to add, as she saw the crestfallen look of her visitor, "the trout, such as those splendid fellows you have kindly brought me, are not to be despised. Thank you, heartily, Reginald. You must stay and join us in tasting their quality. What say you, Gracie?"

What Gracie said need not be reported. That was, I think, the acknowledged beginning of things. About the homely farm, and household duties of the youth and maiden, Love wove its sweet romance, and the older hearts, remembering the fond emotions of their youth, could not chill with censorious words their young and strong affection; an affection, however, which was to be tested in the fires.

TRUST.

LET nothing make thee sad or fretful,
Or too regretful,
Be still;
What God hath ordered must be right,
Then find in it thine own delight,
My will.

Why shouldst thou fill the day with sorrow
About to-morrow,
My heart?
One watches all with care most true;
Doubt not that he will give thee, too,
Thy part.

Only be steadfast, never waver,
Nor seek earth's favor,
But rest;
Thou knowest what God's will must be
For all his creatures—so for thee—
The best. —PAUL FLEMING.

A PARSEE LADY'S PUBLIC SPIRIT.

THE offer of five lakhs of rupees (about $200,000) for a public library and hall in Bombay, made by a Parsee lady, is prophetic of the day when the influence of Indian ladies of rank and wealth and education shall be felt in Indian society in some degree at least as is the case in western countries. Indian history furnishes numerous proofs of the force and capacity of Indian women, and those who have had opportunity of intimate acquaintanceship with Indian ladies of the better class give emphatic testimony to the intellectual force and strong purpose of the Indian women. When Indian women come out of their seclusion and get into touch with the world's progress, they will exhibit a virility of character that will contrast rather sharply with the effeminacy of the average Indian as we know him. That it is a Parsee lady who has made this public-spirited offer is also a fact that touches the rivalry of the eastern and western capitals of India. Parsee ladies enjoy a degree of freedom unknown to almost all other Indian ladies.

REAL SERVICE.

THERE are many different ideas of service, but not all are right. John Ruskin, in his own interesting fashion, makes this distinction: "You are told, indeed, to sing psalms when you are merry," he writes, "and to pray when you need anything; and, by the perversion of the evil spirit, we get to think that praying and psalm-singing are 'service.' If a child finds itself in want of anything it runs and asks its father for it—does it call that doing its father a service? If it begs for a toy or a piece of cake—does it call that serving its father? That, with God, is prayer, and he likes to hear it; . . but he doesn't call that 'serving him.' Begging is not serving. . . So when a child loves its father very much, and is very happy, it may sing little songs about him; but it doesn't call that serving father; neither is singing songs about God serving God. It is enjoying ourselves, if it is anything; most probably it is nothing. Yet we call our beggings and chantings 'divine service;' we say 'divine service will be 'performed' (that's our word—the form of it gone through). Unless we perform divine service in every willing act of our lives, we never perform it at all."

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God, who loveth us,
Hath made and loveth all.

For the benefit of those desiring to attend the World's Fair the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad will sell Excursion tickets to Chicago and return, at all stations on its line, at low rates. Tickets will be on sale until November 1st, and will be valid for return journey until November 15th, 1893. They provide for a reduction of 20 per cent. below regular rates. These tickets will be valid only for continuous journey. Tickets at higher rates will be sold that will permit holders to stop over at Baltimore, Washington, or any other point, going and returning.

Besides the opportunity of visiting Washington, a privilege afforded by no other route, tourists via the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad will traverse the historic Potomac Valley, the theatre of the war between the States. Indian Sunday Schools.

Missionary Lane Writes of the Spiritual Progress of the Tribes in Oklahoma Territory —Worshipping the "Great Spirit."

NOW is the season when the red man displays activity in his own country and when "bad Indians" take the warpath. The "good Indians," on the other hand, make the early summer a time of spiritual and industrial activity. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary, Rev. George W. Sharp, has passed through many stirring experiences while engaged in evangelical work among the Indians of the Southwest. Below we publish a letter from Rev. J. P. Lane, an American Sunday School missionary in Oklahoma, which tells of experiences similar in many respects to those of Mr. Sharp:

"NORMAN, O. T., May 20, 1893.

"I have been at work among the Indians. Sometime ago I visited one part of the Shawnee tribe. This tribe is divided, one part is controlled by Chief 'White Turkey,' and the other by Chief 'Big Jim.' The last-named refused to take their land in allotment, but live on the land in their tribal or community plan. They can talk our language but little, except two or three of them. They are sullen and distant, unless they are hungry and want to beg something. I went to their interpreter and had him to ask the chief to call a meeting of the tribe, that I might hold services with them The chief said, 'maybe so me want no talk now, maybe so some other time.' I learned they would soon hold their annual spring meeting, to worship the 'Great Spirit,' by song and dance. These are great meetings, and they also to give to the 'Great Spirit,' because spring and grass have returned, and horses and cattle will improve.

"Make a Great Feast

"The first had a preliminary meeting. They met in the woods, and their speaker, a large, fine-looking Indian, stood by an oak tree, and made them a great talk. I listened to him, but could not understand his language. I was told it was a prayer for blessings on the land, rivers, grass, corn, stock, &c. In a few days they met again for the feast, song, and dance. I went again and looked on with deep interest. The tribe met at the usual place, where logs had been placed on the ground in a circle. In the forenoon, the men talked in groups, and some played cards, while the women carried wood and water, and looked after the ponies, and did the cooking. Many white people come to see them, but the Indians hardly notice them. The same Indians who a week before, would gladly beg for something to eat, now felt they were in "The Strength and Glory of their Tribe, and everybody else were inferior, and were in-

"Separate from dinners, large kettles of beef, venison, and wild turkey, was being boiled, and then piled on a scaffold of poles about seven feet above the ground. After dinner they went into their tents, and soon emerged dressed in English costume, and hideously painted. The men then seated themselves in a circle, and a wagon sheet was spread on the ground, on which several bushels of boiled meat was poured. After this great quantities of bread was thrown on the meat. When the squaws would bring the bread, as each loaf was thrown on the pile, the men uttered a groan, or rather a growl. This seemed to frighten the little girls, who would throw their loaf of bread, and run. At this the older ones would laugh heartily. When all was placed in a heap, the noise was hushed, and a deep impressive silence followed. The Indians looked Like so many Bronzed Statues.

They were in silent prayer, asking the great spirit to come and eat, hoping he will be pleased with them all the year.

"All was solemn and serious. It seemed as if we [illegible] ago, walking in the gloom and superstition of ages past. Then how gladly did I turn from these things to the great source of light to a world in sun and gloom, and recall the words of David, Psalms 110–130. 'The entrance of thy word giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple.' Soon the drum beat, and the dance commenced. They had songs and wild shouts, that were hideous. I found one who could read, and gave him a Testament, and sent him the Young People's paper for a year, and he says he will help me hold a meeting in the summer. I started a Sunday School, and an Indian girl, very intelligent, was made superintendent. At another place I started a school, and at night slept with my Indian friends.

"I have since been on a trip of about 300 miles among the 'Cheyennes and Assappohoes.' I supplied one new Sunday School of ten Indian children with Lesson Helps and papers. But of this western trip I will write later on. When I returned home away with all that was in them. Fortunately we were in town at the time, and our lives were thus spared. It will be some time before I can re-build, and get on my place again. To describe the horrors of the storm would be impossible. But with hearts of gratitude that we escaped alive, we will try to re-build, and still carry the Word of Life to those so long neglected."

Rub In Rub Out is the way you have to wash clothes with soap. First you rub the soap in; that's work in itself. Then you rub it all out again over the washboard. If you're strong and healthy, and rub hard enough, you may get the dirt all out, too. It's hard work, and every woman knows it. But it isn't the woman only that suffers. She's wearing the clothes out, rubbing them to pieces, all the time. It's just as hard for every thing as it is for every body.

Soak In Soak Out is Pearline's way of washing. All it wants is to be let alone. Put it in the water and it does its own work — yours, too. It brings the dirt out easily and quickly—no hard work, no wearing rub, rub, rub, no washboard.

Doesn't that seem better? It is better. There's a saving of strength and a saving of clothes. And, what some women can't believe, it's absolutely safe. It's just as much so as any good soap.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 377 JAMES PYLE, New York.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

THE USEFUL WOMAN.*

WOMAN'S heart is supposed to be the very dwelling-place of mercy, and a useless and selfish woman is a libel upon her sex. We call upon you to be our sisters of charity, to go forth on errands of mercy to the abodes of sickness and poverty without abjuring all pretensions to the character of wifehood and motherhood. Loathe that spurious sentimentality which weeps over the imaginary woes of a novel, but turns away with a callous heart from those real sufferings which abound on every hand. You do most for yourselves when you do most for others. It is not enough that you pity the sorrows of the poor and the suffering; what your heart pities your hands must do; what you pray for you must strive to attain.

If you desire to live in the true sense of the word, you can least afford to be useless. It is lamentable to see how many women live only as a waste and weight on fast-flying time. O you poor souls living in uselessness, how can I make you see what you are losing! What can I say but

> Rise up, ye women that are at ease,
> Tremble, ye careless daughters, and repeat the old call, "Awake, ye that sleep, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light."

In the woman form of merciful ministry humanity feels the touch as of an angel from heaven. Say not the doors of useful service are closed against you when there are so many poor to help, so many sick longing for the sound of a woman's voice and the touch of a woman's hand. If you have an earnest purpose, it will not want for a sphere, it will make its own sphere. Would you realize the divinest of womanhood's ideals and be "as the angels," listen to the moans of suffering around you. Hearken to the voice that whispers in your soul; begin with some plain, practical, petty duty immediately at hand, and in faithfulness to the lowly duty your life will gradually be brought under the power of a supreme purpose,

> And so the life, death, and it at last forever,
> One grand, sweet song.

THE PREACHER AND THE SPIRIT.†

To get one's sermons, themes, and treatment from the illumining power of the Holy Ghost will beget a marvelous intrepidity. Such a preacher is bound to speak God's truth. As Seneca's pilot said to Neptune, he will say:

> You may sink me or you may save me,
> But I will hold my rudder true; or, as Curran, in his defense of Bond, when he heard the clatter of the arms of his threatening antagonists in the court, said: "You may assassinate me, but you cannot intimidate me." Before whatever human presence such a preacher may be called to speak, his whole being will be so absorbed in that greater Unseen Presence, that the dignitaries of earth will become as nothing.

Such a preacher will be likely to be a man of exceptional personal purity. The mind, which is the channel of the Holy Ghost's inflowing, and the tongue, which is the channel of the Holy Ghost's outflowing, will not be likely to be given over to the control of impure thoughts, or even the coarse and gross forms of jesting in speech.

Such preaching is born only of prayer. It has, like General Gordon, its morning signal. It is told of him that, during his sojourn in the Soudan country, each morning for half an hour there lay outside his tent a white handkerchief. The whole camp knew what it meant, and treated the little signal with the highest respect. No foot crossed the threshold while that little guard kept watch. The most pressing message waited for delivery, and even matters of life and death, until the little signal was withdrawn. God and Gordon were in communion. The man that wants to preach with power must have his times alone with God. If he wants to be a distributing reservoir, he must become a receiving reservoir. If he wants to prevail with man, he must learn, first of all, to prevail with God.

OUR NEGLECTED CHILDREN

What Shall be Done with the Millions who are without Religious Training? — "The Christian Herald's" Missionary and his Sunday School Work in the Southwest.

ONE of the most serious problems that confronts our country to-day, and one which, unfortunately, is not receiving the attention it merits is the condition of the great multitude of young children of both sexes, in the Western and Southwestern States, who are being brought up to manhood and womanhood amid irreligious surroundings. In those parts of the country where there is neither church nor Sabbath School, the parents, as well as their offspring, are naturally indifferent about religion. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that there are many localities in the United States where there is as little religious training for either young or old as though they were situated in the wildest part of Mexico or among the still unevangelized islands of the distant Pacific. It is an accepted truth that a majority of those that become Christians are converted early in life. Each passing year, therefore, lessens the chances of spiritual emancipation among those who are advancing toward manhood and womanhood. The Christian communities of the older States, recognizing their responsibility to the Lord in this matter, have been energetically working for many years past through the American Sunday School Union, opening schools, founding churches, and getting congregations together where formerly none existed. But the growth of population has greatly outstripped this evangelical work, and to-day there are probably two districts unevangelized to every district so situated ten years ago. There are at the present time 153,000 Sunday Schools in the United States with 9,278,000 teachers and scholars; but there are nine million children destitute of Church or Sunday School privileges, 2,100,000 in the Northwest, 1,500,000 in the Southwest, 1,000,000 along the Pacific, 2,700,000 in the South, and the remainder scattered among different States. Here, surely, is one of the most inviting fields for missionary work that has ever been presented to those who feel themselves called to service for the Master, and who remember his injunction "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Two years ago, this month, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the aid of its readers undertook the support of the Rev. George W. Sharp, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in the Southwest. From time to time Mr. Sharp has made reports of the progress of his work, and they have been such as to afford the deepest satisfaction. Under God's blessing, he has been the means of planting the Gospel seed in many quarters where it has borne abundant harvest, and Sunday Schools, churches and chapels are now sprinkled liberally over a large section of Missouri and the adjoining states as a result of his faithful and consecrated efforts. During the earlier years of his service, he organized twenty new schools with sixty-nine teachers and 640 scholars. Last year he revived five schools that were in a moribund condition, on account of spiritual neglect. He erected four churches and made preparations for the construction of a fifth, and all this in addition to an almost superhuman amount of labor, including visits and addresses to schools, preaching 179 sermons and addresses and visits to over 500 families. Such a variety and amount of work might well appall the heart of the stoutest missionary; but Mr. Sharp is constitutionally fond of work, and he has, in these two years, entirely lost sight of self, in his zeal for the progress of the sacred cause he represents. His second year with us has well-nigh closed, and we hope, through the generous assistance of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to be able to retain his services for another year in this promising field. Many of the experiences of a missionary whose territory is so scattered as that of Mr. Sharp, are both interesting and instructive. In one house in South Missouri—in a district many miles remote from any Sunday School or church—he found a growing family who had never heard the Word preached and had never sung a hymn! It was sad to look on these bright children, well-behaved and obedient—and, despite the absence of intellectual training, evidently intelligent—and to reflect that their unfortunate environments had made them in almost every point as great strangers to the Gospel as the dusky children of interior Africa. But Mr. Sharp's experience has taught him to be ready for even the most difficult emergencies in his missionary work. Securing the consent of some kindly-disposed resident to the use of his barn, a Sunday School was organized, and after a visit round about among the farmers, a considerable number of young folks promised to attend. They kept their word. The family first referred to sent their children, and it was a pleasant though an unusual sight, to see all four come riding up to the school on the back of the family mare—a good natured brute that seemed to appreciate and enjoy the situation. This was the first trip they had ever made to a Sunday School. These children are types of many thousands of others who stand waiting for the Gospel! "How shall they believe in him on whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. 10: 14.) In some parts of the West and Southwest, there is a fair sprinkling of Indian and half-breed boys and girls among the new Sunday scholars. These dusky young folks (a characteristic group of them is shown in an illustration on another page), are remarkably attentive. Although by no means so bright as their white brothers and sisters, they are promising pupils, and very many have given evidence of an awakening interest in spiritual things, that gives bright hope for the future.

The year just closing has been even more prolific of good results than the first year of our missionary's labors. Churches and Sunday Schools have multiplied under his fostering care. One of his latest tasks was the formation of Union Church at Baring, Mo., a small, out-of-the-way village, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad. As soon as the village of Baring was located, Mr. Sharp went there to organize a school. He found that it was destitute of both church and school-house; but he secured an upper room over a billiard hall, which was reached by a rude unenclosed stairway on the outside. At first the attendance was small and there were more dry-goods boxes and barrels than chairs for seats; but gradually the work expanded and the school prospered. Sometime later, he succeeded in securing a vacant store-room for the school. The people had now begun to take a general interest in the service and were shortly persuaded to erect a house of worship, which they have now finished. It is a substantial frame building, large enough to accommodate a good audience. The school, in this case, practically gave birth to

THE SONG OF BIRDS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Psalm civ. 12, "By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches."

THERE is an important and improving subject to which most people have given no thought, and concerning which this is the first pulpit discussion, namely, the Song of Birds. If all that has been written concerning music by human voice or about music sounded on instrument by finger or breath were put together, volume by the side of volume, it would fill a hundred alcoves of the national libraries. But about the song of birds there is as much silence as though, a thousand years ago, the last lark had, with his wing, swept the door latch of heaven, and as though never a whippoorwill had sung its lullaby to a slumbering forest at nightfall. We give a passing smile to the call of a bobolink or the chirp of a canary, but about the origin, about the fibre, about the meaning, about the mirth, about the pathos, about the inspiration, about the religion in the song of birds, the most of us are either ignorant or indifferent. A caveat I this morning file in the Hight Court of Heaven against that almost universal irreligion.

First, I remark that which will surprise many, that the song of birds is a regulated and systematic song, capable of being written out in note and staff and bar and clef as much as anything that Wagner or Schumann or Handel ever put on paper. As we pass the grove where the flocks are holding matin or vesper service, we are apt to think that the sounds are extemporized, the rising or falling tone is a mere accident, it is flung up and down by haphazard, the bird did not know what it was doing, it did not care whether it was a long metre psalm or a madrigal. What a mistake! The musician never put on the music rack before him Mendelssohn's "Elijah" or Beethoven's "Concerto" in G. or Spohr's B flat Symphony with more definite idea as to what he was doing than every bird that can sing at all confines himself to accurate and predetermined rendering. The oratorios, the chants, the carols, the overtures, the interludes, the ballads, the canticles, that this morning were heard or will this evening be heard in the forest have rolled down through the ages without a variation. Even the chipmunk's song was ordained clear back in the eternities. At the gates of paradise, it sang in sounds like the syllables [illegible] morning in a Long Island orchard it sang "Kuk!" "Kuk!" "Kuk!" The thrush at the creation uttered sounds like the word "Teacher!" "Teacher!" "Teacher!" as now it utters sounds like [illegible] the summer of the year one, the yellow-hammer trilled that which sounded like the word "If!" "If!" "If!" as in this summer it trills "If!" "If!" "If!" The [illegible] queaths the tune sounding like the words "Pity me, pity me, pity me." The White Sparrow's "Tseep, tseep," woke our great grandfathers as it will awaken our great grandchildren. The "Tee-ka-tee-ka-tee-ka" of the birds in the first century was the same as the "Tee-ka-tee-ka-tee-ka" of the nineteenth century.

The goldfinch has for six thousand years been singing "De-ree dee-ee-ree." But these sounds, which we put in harsh words, they put in cadences, rhythmic, soulful and enrapturing. Now, if there is this order and systematization and rhythm all through God's creation, does it not imply that we should have the same characteristics in the music we make or try to make? Is it not a wickedness that so many parents give no opportunity for the culture of their children in the art of sweet sound? If God stoops to educate every bluebird, oriole and grosbeak in song, how can parents be so indifferent about the musical development of the immortals in their household? While God will accept our attempts to sing, though it be only a hum or a drone, if we can do no better, what a shame that, in this last decade of the nineteenth century, when so many orchestral batons are waving and so many academies of music are in full concert and so many skilled men and women are waiting to offer instruction, there are so many people who cannot sing with any confidence in the house of God, because they have had no culture in this sacred art, or, while they are able to sing a fantasia at a piano amid the fluttering fans of social admirers, nevertheless feel utterly helpless when, in church, the surges of an Ariel or an Antioch roll over them. The old-fashioned country singing school, now much derided and caricatured (and indeed sometimes it was diverted from the real design into the culture of the soft emotions rather than the voice), nevertheless did admirable work, and in our churches we need singing schools to prepare our Sabbath audiences for prompt and spontaneous and multipotent psalmody. This world needs to be stormed with hallelujahs. We [illegible] nahs. From hearing a blind beggar sing, Martin Luther went home at forty years of age to write his first hymn. In the autumn, I hope to have a congregational singing school here during the week, which shall prepare the people for the songs of the holy Sabbath. If the church of God universal is going to take this world for righteousness, there must be added a hundred-fold of more harmony as well as a hundred-fold of more volume to sacred music.

Further, I notice in the song of birds that it is a divinely-taught song. The rarest prima donna of all the earth could not teach the robin one musical note. A kingfisher, flying over the roof of a temple aquake with harmonies, would not catch up one melody. From the time that the first bird's throat was fashioned on the banks of the Gihon and Hiddekel until to-day on the Hudson or Rhine, the winged creature has learned nothing from the human race in the way of carol or anthem. The feathered songsters learned all their music direct from God. He gave them the art in a nest of straw or moss or sticks, and taught them how to lift that song into the higher heavens and sprinkle the earth with its dulcet enchantments. God-fashioned, God tuned, God-launched, God-lifted music! And there is a kind of music that the Lord only can impart to you, my hearer. There have been depraved, reprobate and blasphemous souls which could sing till great auditoriums were in raptures. There have been soloists and bassos and baritones and sopranos whose brilliancy in concert halls has not been more famous than their debaucheries. But there is a kind of song, which, like the song of birds, is divinely fashioned. Songs of pardon. Songs of divine comfort. Songs of worship. "Songs in the night" like those which David and Job mentioned. Songs full of faith and tenderness and prayer like those which the Christian mother sings over the sick cradle. Songs of a broken heart being healed. Songs of the dying flashed upon by opening portals of amethyst. Songs like that which Paul commended to the Colossians, when he said, "Admonish one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing, with grace in your hearts, to the Lord." Songs like Moses sang after the tragedy of the Red Sea. Songs like Deborah and Barak sang at the overthrow of Sisera. Songs like Isaiah heard the redeemed sing as they came to Zion. Oh, God, teach us that kind of song which thou only canst teach, and help us to sing it on earth and sing it in heaven. It was the highest result of sweet sound when under the playing of Paganini one auditor exclaimed reverently, "Oh God!" and another sobbed out, "Oh Christ!"

Further, I remark in regard to the song of birds, that it is trustful, and without any fear of what may yet come. Will you tell me how it is possible for that wren, that sparrow, that chickadee, to sing so sweetly when they may any time be pounced on by a hawk and torn wing from wing? There are cruel beaks in thicket and in sky ready to slay the song birds. Herods on the wing. Modocs of the sky. Assassins armed with iron claw. Murderers of song floating up and down the heavens. How can the birds sing amid such perils? Beside that, how is the bird sure to get its food? Millions of birds have been starved. Yet it sings in the dawn without any certainty of breakfast or dinner or supper. Would it not be better to gather its food for the day before vocalizing? Beside that, the hunters are abroad. Bang! goes a gun in one direction. Bang! goes a gun in another direction. The song will attract the shot and add to the peril. Beside that, yonder is a thunder-cloud and there may be hurricane and hail to be let loose, and what then will become of you, the poor warbler? Beside that, winter will come, and it may be smitten down before it gets to the tropics. Have you never seen the snow strewn with the birds belated in their migration? The titmouse mingles its voice with the snow storms as Emerson describes the little thing he found in tempestuous January:

> Here was this atom in full breath
> Hurling defiance at vast death;
> This scrap of valor just for play
> Fronts the north wind in waiscoat gray.

For every bird, a thousand perils and disasters hovering and sweeping round and round. Yet, there it sings, and it is a trustful song. The bird that has it the hardest, sings the sweetest. The lark from the shape of her claws may not perch on a tree. In the grass her nest is exposed to every hoof that passes. One of the poorest shelters of all the earth is the lark's nest. If she sing at all, you will expect her to render the saddest of threnodies. No, no. She sings exultingly an hour without a pause and mounting three thousand feet without losing a note. Would God we all might learn the lesson. Whatever perils, whatever bereavements, whatever trials are yet to come, sing, sing with all your heart and sing with all your lungs. If you wait until all the hawks of trouble have folded their wings and all the hunters of hate have unloaded their guns and all the hurricanes of disaster have spent their fury, you will never sing at all. David the pursued of Absalom, and the betrayed of Ahithophel, and the depleted of "sores that ran in the night," presents us the best songs of the Bible. John Milton, not able to see his hand before his face, sings for us the most famous poem of all literature, and some of the most cheerful people I have ever met have been Christian people under physical, or domestic, or public torment. The songs of Charles Wesley which we now calmly sing in church, were composed by him between mobs.

Further, in the sky galleries, there are songs adapted to all moods. The meadow lark is mournful, and the goldfinch joyous, and the grosbeak prolonged of note. But the libretto of nature is voluminous. Are you sad; you can hear from the bowers the echo of your grief. Are you glad; you can hear an echo of your happiness. Are you thoughtful; you can hear that which will plunge you into deeper profound. Are you weary; you may catch a restful air. So the songs of birds are administrative in all circumstances. And we would do well to have a hymnology for all changes of condition. You may sing your woes into peace and rouse your joys into greater altitudes. Upon every condition of body and soul, let us try the power of song. The multitudinous utterances of grove and orchard and garden and forest suggest most delightful possibilities.

Further, I notice that the song of birds is a family song. Even those of the feathered throngs which have no song at all, make what utterances they do in sounds of their own family of birds. The hoot of the owl, the clatter of the magpie, the crow of the chanticleer, the drumming of the grouse, the laugh of the loon in the Adirondacks, the cackle of the hen the scream of the eagle, the croak of the raven, are sounds belonging to each particular family; but when you come to those which have real songs, how suggestive that it is always a family song. All the skylarks, all the nightingales, all the goldfinches, all the blackbirds, all the cuckoos, prefer the song of their own family and never sing anything else. So the most deeply impressive songs we ever sing are family songs. They have come down from generation to generation. You were sung to sleep in your infancy and childhood by songs that will sing in your soul forever. Where was it, my brother or sister, that you heard the family song — on the banks of the Ohio, or the Alabama, or the Androscoggin, or the Connecticut, or the Tweed, or the Thames, or the Raritan? That song at eventide, when you were tired out—indeed too tired to sleep, and you cried with leg ache, and you were rocked and sung to sleep,—you hear it now, the soft voice from sweet lips, she as tired perhaps more tired than you, but she rocked and you slumbered. Oh, those family songs! The songs that father sang, that mother sang, that sisters and brothers sang. They roll on us to-day with a reminiscence that fills the throat, as well as the heart, with emotion. In our house in my childhood it was always a religious song, I do not think that the old folks knew anything but religious songs; at any rate, I never heard them sing anything else. It was "Jesus, lover of my soul," or "Rock of ages," or "There is a fountain filled with blood," or "Mary to the Saviour's tomb." Mothers, be careful what you sing your children to sleep with. Let it be nothing frivolous or silly. Better have in it something of Christ and heaven. Better have in it something that will help that boy thirty years from now to bear up under the bombardment of temptation. Better have in it something that will help that daughter thirty years from now when upon her come the cares of motherhood and the agonies of bereavement and the brutal treatment of one who swore before high heaven that he would cherish and protect. Do not waste the best hour for making an impression upon your little one, the hour of dusk, the beach between the day and the night.

Sing not a doleful song, but a suggestive song, a Christian song, a song you will not be ashamed to meet when it comes to you in the eternal destiny of your son and daughter. The oriole has a loud song, and the chewink a long song, and the bluebird a short song, but it is always a family song, and let your gloaming song to your children, whether loud or long or short, be a Christian song. These family songs are about all we keep of the old homestead. The house where you were born will go into the hands of strangers. The garments that were carefully kept as relics will become moth-eaten. The family Bible can go into the possession of only one of the family. The lock of gray hair may be lost from the locket, and in a few years all signs and mementoes of the old homestead will be gone forever. But the family songs, those that we heard at two years of age, at five years of age, at ten years of age, will be indestructible, and at forty or fifty or sixty or seventy years of age will give us a mighty boost over some rough place in the path of our pilgrimage. Many years ago a group of white children were captured and carried off by the Indians.

Years after, a mother who had lost two children in that capture, went among the Indians, and there were many white children in line, but so long a time had passed, the mother could not tell which were hers, until she began to sing the old nursery song, and her two children immediately rushed up, shouting "Mamma!" "Mamma!" Yes, there is an immortality in a nursery song. Hear it, all you mothers, an immortality of power to rescue and save. What an occasion that must have been in Washington, December 17th, 1850, when Jenny Lind sang "Home, Sweet Home," the author of those words, John Howard Payne, seated before her. She had rendered her other favorite songs, "Casta Diva," and her "Flute Song," with fine effect, but when she struck "Home, Sweet Home," John Howard Payne rose under the power, and President Fillmore and Henry Clay and Daniel Webster and the whole audience rose with him. Anything connected with home ransacks our entire nature with a holy power, and songs that get well started in the nursery or by the family hearth roll on after the lips that sung them are forever silent and the ears that first heard them forever cease to hear.

THE FEATHERED CHOIR.

I preach this sermon just before many of you will go out to pass days or weeks in the country. Be careful how you treat the birds. Remember they are God's favorites, and if you offend them, you offend him. He is so fond of their voices that there are forests where for a hundred miles no human foot has ever trod and no human ear has ever listened. Those interminable forests are concert halls with only one auditor — the Lord God Almighty. He builded those auditoriums of leaves and sky and supports all that infinite minstrelsy for himself alone. Be careful how you treat his favorite choir. In Deuteronomy, he warns the people: "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones or eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days." So you see your own longevity is related to your treatment of birds. Then go forth and attend the minstrelsy. Put off startling colors, which frighten the winged songsters into silence or flight, and put on your more sober attire, and move noiselessly into the woods, further and further from the main road, and have no conversation, for many a concert in and out of doors has been ruined by persistent talkers, and then sit down on a mossy bank:

> Where a wild stream with headlong shock
> Comes brawling down a bed of rock.

And after perhaps a half an hour of intense solitude, there will be a tap of a beak on a tree branch far up sounding like the tap of a musical baton, and then first there will be a solo, followed by a duet or quartet, and afterward by doxologies in all the tree tops and amid all the branches, and if you have a Bible along with you, and you can without rustling the leaves, turn to the 148th Psalm of David, and read: "Praise the Lord, beasts, and all cattle, creeping things and flying fowl," and then turn over quietly to my text, and read, "By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches:" or, if under the power of the bird voices you are transported, as when Doctor Worgan played so powerfully on the organ at St. John's that Richard Cecil said he was in such blessed bewilderment, he could not find in his Bible the first chapter of Isaiah, though he leafed the book over and over, and you shall be so overcome with forest harmony that you cannot find the Psalms of David, never mind, for God will speak to you so mightily, it will make no difference whether you hear his voice from the printed page or the vibrating throat of one of his plumed creatures.

While this summer more than usual out of doors, let us have what my text suggests, an out-of-doors religion. What business had David with all the advantages of costly religious service, and smoking incense on the altar, to be listening to the chantresses among the tree-branches? Ah! he wanted to make himself and all who should come after him more alert and more worshipful amid the sweet sounds and beautiful sights of the natural world. There is an old church that needs to be re-dedicated. It is older than St. Pauls or St. Peters, or St. Marks, or St. Sophia, or St. Isaacs. It is the cathedral of Nature. That is the church in which the services of the Millennium will be held. The buildings fashioned out of stone and brick and mortar will not hold the people. Again the Mount of Olives will be the pulpit. Again the Jordan will be the Baptistry. Again the mountains will be the galleries. Again the skies will be the blue ceiling. Again the sunrise will be the front door and the sunset the back door of that temple. Again the clouds will be the upholstery and the morning mist the incense. Again the trees will be the organ-loft where "the fowls of heaven have their habitation which sing among the branches." Saint Francis d' Assisi preached a sermon to birds and pronounced a benediction upon them, but all birds preach to us, and their benediction is almost supernal. While, this summer, amid the works of God, let us learn responsiveness. Surely if we cannot sing, we can hum a tune, and if we cannot hum a tune, we can whistle. If we cannot be an oriole, we can be a quail. In some way let us demonstrate our gratitude to God. Let us not be beaten by the chimney swallow and the humming bird and the brown-thresher. Let us try to set everything in our life to music, and if we cannot give the carol of the song sparrow, take the plaint of the hermit thrush. Let our life be an anthem of worship to the God who created us and the Christ who ransomed us and the Holy Ghost who sanctifies us. And our last song! May it be our best song! The swan was thought by the ancients never to sing except when dying. In the time of Edward IV. no one was allowed to own a swan except he were a king's son, or had considerable estate. Through one or two hundred years of life that bird was said never to utter anything like music, until its last moment came, and, then, lifting its crested beauty, it would pour forth a song of almost matchless thrill, resounding through the groves. And so, although the struggles of life may be too much for us, and we may find it hard to sing at all, when the last hour comes to you and me, may there be a radiance from above and a glory settling round that shall enable us to utter a song on the wings of which we shall mount to where the music never ceases and the raptures never die.

"W[illegible] T[illegible]
my love,
He is floating down from his native grove.
No loved one, no nestling nigh,
He is floating down by himself to die.
Death darkens his eye and unplumes his wings,
Yet the sweetest song is the last he sings.
Live so, my child, that when death shall come,
Swan-like and sweet, it may waft thee home!"

THE SLAVE RAIDS.

THE cruelties of the slave dealers in Africa are vividly described in a recent report from Dr. Kerr Cross of Karonga. He writes that as lately as November 18th, a band of Angoni surrounded a village at the north end of Lake Nyassa, killing the men and capturing the women and children. The village was only three and a half hours from Karonga, the trading station of the African Lakes Company. In the attempt to prevent the rescue of these captives the Angoni speared many of the women, but 200 were saved. One of Dr. Cross's house boys, who came from this village, asked leave to go home and see for himself what had happened. While at the village he wrote the following pathetic note: "Dear Dr. Cross — I write to tell you that all the people of the village are dead. My mother is dead. All my friends are dead. I know the names of the women who were speared. I am with great, great sorrow indeed. Perhaps I shall return in five days. Mrs. Cross, you are good. I am your boy. MWAKATUNDU." Dr. Cross may well add: "A tale of such things happening within three and a half hours' journey of a trading station should stimulate all at home to do their utmost to hasten the coming of a new day to unhappy Africa."

PAUL AT PHILIPPI.

S.S. Lesson for July 9. Acts 16: 19-34. Golden Text, Acts 16: 31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE have already seen that the introduction of the Gospel into Europe was, like so many of the works of God, small, humble, unnoticed in its beginning. Who would have thought that out of the cry of a company of women gathered together by the riverside, in a heathen city, to seek after the true God, should have resulted the foundation of the Church of Christ in Europe? Let us never despise the day of small things. (Zech. 4 : 10.) How long Paul and his two companions remained in the house of Lydia at Philippi is not told us. Precious days were they for Lydia and her household, in which her opened heart received the blessed Word of God which Paul unfolded in the power of the Holy Ghost. Long had she been groping in the dark, probably thoroughly dissatisfied with the darkness of heathenism, hearing eagerly anything about the true God from any Jewish teacher, whom she might meet with in the course of business, but with an intense hunger in her heart to know this God of Israel, to have to do with him, to prove if what she had heard of him was true. There are those who have known this bitter cry of an awakened spirit after God, this impossibility of being satisfied with words, or doctrines, or human help of any kind. "My soul thirsteth for God for the living God." This is the heart's language. Yes; "as the hart panteth for the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O, God!" (Ps. 42 : 1, 2.)

By the riverside at the place of prayer (R. V.), whether a building or whether the open air, the few listeners who had been gathered in this city sat at Paul's feet to hear messages from God through him. But the enemy of souls could not long let things go on quietly, he placed day by day, in the path of these worshippers of God, one of the priestesses of Apollo, a poor, hopeless creature, through whose frenzied soothsayings her masters gained much money. She followed the men of God and the little company of Philippian disciples, attracting attention to them by her ceaseless cry: "These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation." It was just such a notoriety which they would have wished to avoid; it was a test of love and patience.

As God finds hearing ears, bowed hearts, attentive spirits, and above all surrendered wills for his truth, the enemy concentrates his forces to oppose. It is no sign of failure when Satan awakes; he only opposes that which injures his kingdom. Paul came under the same commission as the other apostles, for, although, he was not of the first twelve, yet the signs which should follow them that believe most surely should belong to him; and "In thy name they shall cast out devils" (Mark 16: 17) belonged to him as much as to Peter, James or John. Why then did he not cast out this demon the first time he met this oppressed one? Because, like his Lord, he waited until his hour was come. Paul knew, more fully than most men of God; he was not only a "child" but a "son" of God, by the very fact that he had so far graduated in the school of Christ as to understand his leading. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." He bowed to the Holy Spirit, knowing that whatever gift or commission he had received he was only an instrument in a Master-hand. "All these [spiritual gifts] worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as he will." (1. Cor. 12: 11, R.V.) But the time came when all was ripe, and when, in the freedom of the Spirit, he could say with authority: "I command thee in the name of Jesus to come out of her." What a lesson for impulsive workers! Here was a man full of the Holy Ghost, but, until the Spirit had brought him into [illegible] Christ's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] possessed one, he could not and would not go forward. When God's time was come, and the word was spoken of God through him, the gates of hell could not prevail against him; the spirit "came out of her that same hour."

Now the battle began; the name of Christ had been manifestly superior to the hosts of darkness, and heathenism had received a deadly blow. No wonder Satan should rage: he stirred up the priests of the temple whose slave this newly delivered one had been. "The hope of their gains was gone." Down, deeply rooted beneath their superstitions, there was "covetousness which is idolatry." They saw that, with the deliverance of their victim, they should become poor men. No question was it with them of right or wrong, truth or error, but what was to their advantage or disadvantage. On the plea that their teachings were dangerous to the peace of the city, they obtained an order for the apprehension of Paul and Silas, and brought them before the rulers with the complaint: "These men, being Jews, do exceeding trouble our city, and teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, nor to observe, being Romans." Party spirit is easily aroused, the multitude is always ready for anything which arouses political indignation, and the messengers of peace found themselves the prey of a furious multitude in whose presence they were robbed of their garments, publicly scourged, and finally cast into prison with a charge to the jailor to keep them safely. He was not behind the multitude in cruelty; he thrust them into the inner prison: probably a dungeon, where he made their feet fast in the stocks.

It is in circumstances such as these that men know the reality of the God they worship. Paul was learning lessons which should enable him to teach with indisputable authority, later on, that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them which are called according to his purpose," i.e., to be conformed to the image of God's Son. Far from counting it a strange thing which happened to him, he rejoiced inasmuch as he was partaker of Christ's sufferings; and so filled were he and Silas with prayer and praise that the prisoners, evildoers of all sorts, heard them.

God Heard Them, and in his own wondrous way delivered them. It was not too much for him to send an earthquake for the express purpose of delivering his faithful servants, and showing to the heathen that their power against his messengers had a limit, and was bounded by his permission. The jailer awoke from his sleep to find himself still in possession of the keys, while every lock was broken; and the manacles and fetters were unfastened from every hand without any intervention of man. It was a terrible moment for him; public disgrace and execution awaited him if he proved unfaithful to his charge, and the prisoners committed to him were not forthcoming. To him there was but one alternative, and he was about to take it; it was suicide. Now was the moment for a man of God. Neither manacles nor prison doors were between the apostle Paul and liberty, escape was offered him from another power than the jailer's; but Paul had still a witness to bear for the Master he served in this prison, and he said: "Do thyself no harm for we are all here."

What? would it be possible that the natural love of life should not prevail in a moment like this? Could it be that a man in circumstances of such unjust imprisonment, when God himself had intervened to deliver him, should yet delay to escape, that he might save the life of man who had treated him with brutality?

This was "Newness of Life" which can spring from no other root than being crucified with Christ. The heathen man could not understand it, but it overpowered him. Such fruit showed a something in the doctrine of these men which was contrary to all else he had ever seen or heard of; he called for a light sprang in trembling, and fell down before the servants of God, saying, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house, and they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house," family, servants, prisoners. Oh, the mighty power of an indwelling Christ! Oh, the delivering powers of that love which seeketh not her own! An hour before, Paul and Silas were prisoners in body, but in spirit so free that not a trace of oppression or self-pity restrained them from glorifying God, and entering, as willing living sacrifices, into his thoughts and purposes. They were free in spirit and had the circumstances in which they were placed under their feet, before the Lord worked a miracle to deliver their bodies from prison. There was a true kingliness, a very real reigning with Christ in the heat of the trial before the Lord made them visibly masters of the situation. The Lord tries faith, patience, love, zeal, by fire, to see of what sort it is, whether in the power of an endless life or whether vacillating like everything which is of self-life and self-power.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE city of Philippi, where the events of the lesson occurred, stood on the banks of a river called Gangites. Its original name was Krenives, but when Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, took it from the Thracians, he made it a frontier town and gave it his own name. About a hundred years before Paul's visit Augustus won a famous victory in the plain outside the city and in honor of it made Philippi a Roman colony. It is now in ruins, but parts of the wall still stand and there is a gap in them facing the river which was probably the gate out of which Paul came to find the place by the riverside where prayer was wont to be made. The demented girl mentioned in the narrative doubtless belonged to the tribe of the Satræ who lived in the mountains. When Paul cured her and her employers dragged him to the magistrates and lodged their complaint against him, there seems to have been no regular trial, as there would have been if it had been known that Paul was a Roman citizen, but he was at once beaten without a chance to make his defence. He appears to have felt the ignominy keenly as was shown by his compelling the magistrates to make a public apology afterward. It was probably about the year fifty-two when these events occurred and Paul would be about fifty years old. The friends he made in this city were very dear to him and he to them. He visited them twice afterward and when he was in prison in Rome about twelve years later, he wrote to them the letter which is in the New Testament. As he mentions there, he was indebted to them for timely help sent to him on several occasions when other churches appeared to have forgotten him.

The hope of their gains was gone. It has been noticed that while Paul was opposed by both Jews and Gentiles the opposition was not based on the same ground. The Jews hated him for preaching doctrines which they did not believe, but the Gentiles because his preaching injured business. Here in Philippi he spoiled the trade of a fortune-teller and at Ephesus he imperiled the trade of the makers of images. Luther used to say that the cause of his being persecuted was the same. The Romish priests he declared were not troubled by his heresies but were afraid that his giving the Bible to the people would so open the eyes of their followers that they would no longer be imposed upon. "I am letting in light," he said, "and the priests know that such trash as they trade in can only be sold in the dark. If the people's eyes had not been enlightened, by and by, the priests might have led them to eat hay. Anything will go down a blind man's throat." So the pope and the priests hated Luther and persecuted him because they saw that wherever his teachings gained a foothold "the hope of their gains was gone."

Cast them into prison. They were able to afflict the body but could not imprison or depress the soul. Man's power ends there. If a man is supported by a great purpose, or a noble aim he is not distressed by bodily trial or hardship. When Garibaldi was thrown into prison he said, "Let fifty Garibaldis be thrust into prison, but let Rome be free." This spirit set Italy on fire. When he went before a crowd of young men to appeal for recruits, they asked what he had to offer as inducements. The old man replied, "Poverty, hardship, battles, wounds, and—victory." They caught his enthusiasm, threw their hats into the air, and enlisted on the spot.

Their feet fast in the stocks. This instrument of punishment consisted of an horizontal bar having two semi-circular holes in its edge. At one end was a hinge by which another bar was attached to it. The upper bar had also semi-circular holes in the edge corresponding to those in the lower bar, so that when the upper bar was let down on the lower the holes became circular. A seat was placed about two feet away and on a level with the holes in the bars. The culprit was placed on the seat with his ankles resting in the holes of the lower bar and the upper bar was lowered upon them, thus holding him in a most uncomfortable position. In some cases similar bars held the head and hands and the instrument then became the pillory. In some old villages in England the stocks still stand, generally in or near the churchyard, and are used for drunkards and incorrigible loafers. The punishment was in use in ancient times. Jeremiah was put in the stocks (see Jer. 20: 2.) It is also mentioned in Job 13: 27, and Prov. 7: 22.

Prayed and sang praises. Strange employment for men in prison whose feet were held fast in the stocks. A stranger might well have wondered what cause men so circumstanced could have for joy and praise. But they belonged to those who count it an honor to suffer for Christ's sake and many since their day have found reason to sing praises in prison. The good John Philpot was put in a dungeon under the house of the Bishop of London, the Bishop thinking he would be safer there and less likely to get release than in the common jail. Other prisoners for the faith joined him there and they, like Paul and Silas, sang and praised God. The Bishop was told and sent for Philpot and asked him what was the cause of the unseemly merriment. Philpot said, "It is not merriment, we are singing only Psalms, It is a dark and comfortless place where we are and therefore we thus solace ourselves. I trust your Lordship will not be angry; we do but obey the apostle, 'If any be of an upright heart, let him sing psalms.' We, though in affliction are of an upright heart, therefore refresh ourselves with such singing."

A great earthquake. God can use natural laws to effect his own purposes and this earthquake was timed for the effect it would have in that Philippian prison. A great writer has said: "The shock that buried Lisbon in 1755 never ceased to vibrate till it reached the wilds of Scotland and the vineyards of Madeira. It was felt among the islands of the Grecian Archipelago, and it changed the level of the solitary lakes that sleep beneath the shadow of the North Alps. Even so the shock that Satan's kingdom sustained when Christianity was established will not cease to vibrate till it move the whole world."

What must I do to be saved? He probably expected that he would have to do some great and difficult thing and had no idea it would be so simple. The story is told of the crew of a ship raising a signal of distress while on a voyage on the north of South America. When hailed by another vessel and asked the nature of their trouble, they signalled, "We have no water; we are dying for want of water." Quickly the answering signal was raised, "Dip it up then; you are on fresh water." No time was lost in obeying. The ship was on the broad waters of the Amazon with plenty of fresh water around it and not on the salt sea as the sailors supposed. So it is not necessary to go far to do some penance to get salvation; it is near and needs only to be taken.

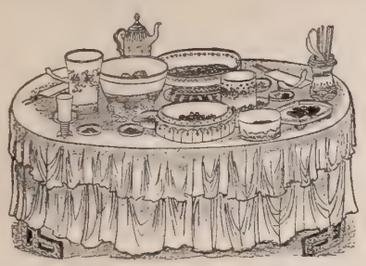
Believe . . . and thou shalt be saved. Some would have told him to quit his sins, to be kind to his prisoners, to give money to the poor and to clean up his life if he wanted to be saved. Paul's prescription was simply, "Believe." He knew that everything would follow that. The man who believes in Christ has in himself the root of the tree that will produce holiness, cleanness of life and good works. All true philosophers recognize the fact. When a law was made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth of England, that all the people should attend the Protestant Church, the papists sent to Rome to know the pleasure of the Pope. He returned for answer, "Tell the Catholics in England to give me their hearts, and the Queen may take the rest."

A little girl having one day read to her teacher the first twelve verses of the fifth chapter of the Gospel of Matthew, he asked her to stop and tell him which of these divine graces, said by our Lord to be blessed, she should most like to have. She paused a little and then said, "I would rather be pure in heart." Her teacher asked her why she chose this above all the rest. "Sir," she said, "If I had a pure heart I should have all the other graces spoken of in the chapter."

IN A COREAN HOSPITAL.

Mrs W. J. Hall Describes her Work in the Women's Foreign Missionary Hospital in Seoul, Corea—The Helpers and the Patients—Entertaining Visitors in a Corean Home.

IN former numbers of this journal we have published letters from Dr. W. J. Hall, who studied medicine under Dr. George D. Dowkontt in New York, and after taking his diploma went to Corea as a medical missionary. We have now the pleasure of publishing a letter just received from his wife who is also a physician and has charge of the Woman's Hospital at Seoul, Corea. A picture of this institution for which we are indebted to the Heathen Woman's Friend appears on this page. The picture, Mrs. Hall, draws of the needless suffering endured by the women of Corea, owing to the lack of medical and surgical knowledge in that land is very pathetic. There is reason for thankfulness that such ladies as she are willing to go out and devote their lives to relieving the suffering and preaching the glad tidings of salvation to the lost.



LUNCHEON LAID FOR VISITORS IN A COREAN HOME.

The woman's hospital in Seoul is about six years old. It was at first under the charge of Dr. Meta Howard, but after two years labor her failing health obliged her to leave it. She was succeeded by Drs. Scranton and McGill, who kept the work in operation for a year. Since then Mrs. Hall has had charge of it. She says:

"The second day after my arrival in Seoul, I was introduced to this growing work, and found my hands quite full from the beginning. As yet there were no trained Corean helpers to assist in the drug work or nursing, and it took a great deal of time to make all the needed mixtures, ointments and powders, to take temperatures and pulses of patients, and see to the giving of their food and medicine regularly, to do all the dressings of ulcers and abscesses and the many other things incident to dispensary and hospital work, which do not necessarily need to be done by a doctor. I missed the good deaconess nurses who helped me in New York, and felt much the need of one here. However, I set to work. Miss Rothweiler gave me valuable assistance, and she asked for volunteers among the Corean school girls, and soon I had three bright willing girls, of from 12 to 14 years of age, in training. They were of but little help, though, except for dispensary hours, so I was very glad when Miss Lewis was sent to my rescue, something over a year later. We have also secured the services of Mrs. Mary Whong, one of our married school girls to take the place of the former Corean matron who was too old to learn foreign methods. Mary felt called of God to do this work among her sick sisters, and she makes a good Bible woman. Miss Lewis and Mary have an interesting service each day in the waiting-room with the dispensary patients and all the in-patients able to come.

"During my first year here, the fourth of woman's medical work, I treated 2,476 cases among all classes, the highest and the lowest, 277 of these were surgical cases, and seventy-seven were calls to patients in their homes. The next year the number of cases treated was 4,022; 327 of which were surgical and 140 calls to the homes; and the work of the sixth year thus far promises to outgrow the last. We have added three new wards to our hospital, one room of which is for children.

"It is Corean custom for man and wife never to see each other until after marriage. I have had some illustrations of this custom among my cases for hare-lip operation that may interest you. One young girl of seventeen came to me with harelip whose husband of course, had very good reason for not living with her after seeing her, but after the operation she returned to him so good-looking that they have lived happily ever since Another young woman whose husband has put her away for the same deformity was so pretty after the operation that he wanted her to come back, but she would not. I remember treating another young woman whose husband didn't love her after becoming acquainted with her because she was deaf; he sent her back to her mother, who brought her to me saying if I could only cure her, she would dance for joy. It is rather amusing, if it were not often so sad, how the men do get sold in securing their wives in this peculiar way; but I suppose the women as often get disappointed in their husbands. One patient jumped into a well to drown herself, because she didn't love her husband.

"I have lost two Corean girl assistants, both under fifteen, because of the early marriage custom of the people, and for sometime I have been wishing for a young widow to train in dispensary work and to take charge of the children's ward under Miss Lewis, and at last I have secured just the one I needed, she neither read nor wrote in her own tongue when she came, but in a few months at the girls' school has learned both. She is a Christian and has been baptized Susan. The way in which Susan's face has brightened since she found there is really a work for her to do in the world is something wonderful.

"Already the work in the hospital has been the means God has used to bring a number of both women and men to know the Saviour's love. One slight operation with its consequent redressings, caused the mother of the patient, the grandfather and grandmother, an uncle and aunt, all to become interested in the new doctrine, and they are now baptized Christians, and active church members.

"During the coldest weather of the winter dispensary patients are few, and this winter if we have finished at 4 P. M., Miss Lewis and I have tried to follow up the work a litle in the homes of former patients. We are always gladly welcomed. Two or three places we have visits regular once a week for nearly four months. We read the Gospel and cathechism with them and teach them to pray. Miss Lewis teaches the children to sing our Christian songs in Corean. One little girl has learned all the words of 'There is a happy land,' and 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' and has taught them to her little five year old brother. They are now learning, 'A charge to keep I have.' When one dear old lady, in a family we visit first heard about heaven, she was so delighted she wanted to die and go there at once.

"These visits to the homes of the people are always welcomed. Sometime ago, we entered a house, and as is always the Corean hospitable custom, they would make us partake of some food, and brought us each a little table, with raw chestnuts shelled and scraped, boiled eggs with the shells peeled off, oranges also peeled and some Corean candy. We have learned to eat these dainties with quite a relish, and they really would be nice if you could feel sure that the hands of the one who did the peeling were clean.

"I open work next Tuesday in the Baldwin Dispensary, at the East Gate of the city. We have a nice site there and the work promises to grow rapidly. This dispensary was named in honor of the lady who helped to build it, and who also gave the first sum towards opening work for women in Corea—saying, 'I give this as a nucleus around which the contributions of the Church shall gather, until that dark land, 'where woman has no name,' is reached and one more fire lighted never to go out until the knowledge of God covers the whole earth.'

"Dr. Hall is opening up medical mission work in the northern interior with headquarters at Pyong Yang, and if the way opens I am anxious to begin work for women there soon. Corean people very much dislike leaving a place in which their families have lived for generations, but when I asked Esther if she would be willing to go to Pyong Yang and work for Jesus, she replied, 'I will go wherever the Lord open door for me, if he open door in Pyong Yang, I will go. I give my body and soul and heart to the Lord—my body and my heart and my soul is all the Lord's things, and I give up my life to teach my people about God, even if people kill me. I do not hope to get rich and have many pretty things, but I want to work for Jesus most of all.'

"I am very glad to learn that the W. F. M. S. are sending out Dr. Mary Cutler to us this spring, but if we follow up our work in the homes whose doors stand open to receive us, if we have time to study the language as we ought, and are ready to begin work at the new points as they are opened, we need many more like her.

"The work has never given me much time to study Corean, and though now with Miss Lewis and Mary Whoany in the hospital, Esther, Susan, and Lucy trained to help in the drug-room and dispensary, I can accomplish much more in less time than the first year, yet with the increased work, the out-calls, and teaching my Corean assistants physiology and Materia Medica, I do not get the time for study that I need, and can not do the personal work with my patients that I would like. It is a mistake, it seems to me, for any missionary to have work either requiring much time or care, outside of the language for the first year or two; for though one may feel dissatisfied for a time to think they are doing so little, the result accomplished in the end will be far greater. Oh, that the people at home might be made to understand this, and instead of keeping the field just barely manned to do medical and school work, which always bring the people to us, they would send enough workers so that we could feed the people who come the bread of Life in their own language, and not send the many away with cured bodies, but starving souls!

"I want to tell you about some of the ways in which my patients have been treated by Corean doctors. Many have scars when they have been burned for this or that trouble, with red hot irons. I have removed several tumors, the skin over which had thus been burned. I am treating a woman now who for a pain in her arm was burned so deeply that the tissue sloughed down to the muscle, and she had erysipelas in her whole arm and shoulder. Many a wrist or ankle have been made to need amputation by having needles stuck in them for a mere sprain.

"How much we need more medical missionaries for these poor sisters of ours! What a glorious work not only to relieve the poor suffering bodies and sin-sick souls of those who come to us, but to train such young women as Esther, Mary and Susan, who in turn will do much to teach better ways even in this generation, and whose influence on the coming generations will be felt in ever widening circles. If I can only place one little brick in the pavement of the Lord's pathway, I will place it there, that coming generations may walk thereon to the heavenly city.

"When a young girl, I read one of Mary Lyon's addresses to a graduating class, and a sentence in that address has ever influenced my whole life and I would that it may thus be used to influence every girl or young woman who may read this, it is, 'If you want to serve your race, go where no one else will go, and do what no one else will do.'"

A Missionary's Experience Among the Indians in Oklahoma.

FROM Oklahoma Territory, comes an interesting missionary experience among the Indians, the writer being an agent of the American Sunday School Union. He says:

"I was with the presiding elder. The first day we travelled in the Chicasaw Nation, and at night camped out near a small creek. A cold norther blew up, and, wood being scarce, we suffered with cold all night. The next day we reached a small town, and met some friends. Leaving these we went to Wichato Nation. We travelled hard all day, and about sun-down we met some emigrants. They told us it was nine miles to wood or water. A heavy storm-cloud was coming up in the west, and with no shelter, no wood or water, and a coming storm, it was not the most cheerful outlook; leaving the road, we drove toward some small bushes about a mile away, and there we found a ravine, that soon deepened to an immense canyon; we drove into a place to shelter from the hard wind, if the wind came on, and while my friend lariated our horses on the grass, I took a bucket and went down the canyon to look for water. It was deep and narrow, with great walls of sandstone on either side. Sometimes it was difficult to walk. It was a wild and desolate region, but the scenery was grand. Tired and thirsty, I kept on, until at last, to my great joy, I stood on the bank of a fine pool of water. I gave a shout of great joy, and the sound echoed and reverberated in strange contrast with the twilight stillness that had seemed oppressive. We watered our horses, found wood for a fire, cooked our supper, spread our blankets on the grounds, and with thankful hearts lay down to rest.

"Our faithful dog kept growling at the hungry wolves, but we were soon sound asleep. About midnight the rain commenced, but fortunately it soon ceased. At daylight we awoke with the singing of birds the howling of wolves, and the noise of the wild turkey far away on the cliffs. It was Sunday morning, and after a hearty breakfast we started again. At noon we passed out of the Wichato Nation on the lands allotted to the Cheyenne Indians. At Segar we found large numbers of Indians in their teepees. A good school for them was commenced here a few months ago, and is doing very well. We were kindly received, and in the evening I preached to a large congregation of them from Prov. 4: 23. The next morning I made them glad by telling them I would send them papers and lesson helps for Sunday School work. A Sunday School has started, but the teachers who were white persons, were not able to buy Sunday-School helps, and the Indians need to be taught by illustrations and pictures a great deal. I came from there to Cloud Chief.

"The country was opened one year ago. Civilization is moving with a rapid march, and with it we want to see the "Word of God" placed in reach of all. A great work needs to be done among the Indians, many of whom still make night hideous with their strange cries and wild war-whoops."

THE ENEMY IN COREA.

Recent advices from Corea, show that the fierce opposition to the missionaries there had been excited by a religious political society called Togaku-To, and is not the work of the people generally. The Society had plotted to raise a rebelllon against the King if he refused to expel all foreigners from the country, as it demanded, but the King promptly arrested the ringleaders. It is feared, however, that the Society, which is very powerful, may yet cause trouble.

A NATIONAL DANGER.

OH, how many are waiting to see if something cannot be done! Thousands of drunkards waiting, who cannot go ten minutes in any direction without having the temptation before their eyes or appealing to their nostrils, they fighting against it with enfeebled will and diseased appetite, conquering, then surrendering, conquering again and surrendering again, and crying: "How long, O Lord, how long before these infamous solicitations shall be gone?"

And how many mothers there are waiting to see if this national curse cannot lift! Is that the boy who had the honest breath, who comes home with breath vitiated or disguised? What a change! How quickly those habits of early coming home have been exchanged for the rattling of the night-key in the door, long after the last watchman has gone by and tried to see that everything was closed up for the night! Oh, what a change for that young man who we had hoped would do something in merchandise, or in artisanship, or in a profession that would do honor to the family name long after mother's wrinkled hands are folded from the last toil! All that exchanged for startled look when the door-bell rings, lest something has happened.

I am not much of a mathematician, and I cannot estimate it; but is there any one here quick enough at figures to estimate how many mothers there are waiting for something to be done? Ay, there are many wives waiting for domestic rescue. What a hell on earth a woman lives in who has a drunken husband! O Death, now lovely thou art to her, and how soft and warm thy skeleton hand! The sepulchre at midnight in winter is a king's drawing-room compared with that woman's home. It is not so much the blow on the head that hurts, as the blow on the heart. The rum fiend came to the door of that beautiful home and opened the door and stood there, and said: "I curse this dwelling with an unrelenting curse. I curse that father into a maniac, I curse that mother into a pauper. I curse those sons into vagabonds. I curse those daughters into profligacy. Cursed be bread-tray and cradle. Cursed be couch and chair and family Bible with record of marriages and births and deaths. Curse upon curse!" O how many wives there are waiting to see if something cannot be done to shake these frosts of the second death off the orange-blos[illegible]!

Yea, God is waiting, the God who works through human instrumentalities, waiting to see whether the nation is going to [illegible] so, God will wipe out the nation as he did Phœnicia, as he did Rome, as he did Thebes, as he did Babylon. Ay, he is waiting to see what the Church of God will do. If the Church does not do its work, then he will wipe it out, as he did the Church of Ephesus, Church of Thyatira, Church of Sardis. The Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches to-day stand side by side with an impotent look, gazing on this evil, which costs this country more than a billion dollars a year, to take care of the 800,000 paupers, and the 315,000 criminals, and the 30,000 idiots, and to bury the 75,000 drunkards.

I once looked with wondering eyes on the "Heidelberg tun." It is the great liquor vat of Germany, which is said to hold eight hundred hogsheads of wine, and only three times in a hundred years has it been filled. But, as I stood and looked at it, I said to myself: "That is nothing—eight hundred hogsheads. Why, our American vat holds four million five hundred thousand barrels of strong drinks, and we keep three hundred thousand men with nothing to do but to see that it is filled." To attack this great monster of intemperance requires us to rally all our Christian courage, Through the press, through the pulpit, through the platform, we must assault it. Would to God that all our American Christians would band together, not for crack-brained fanaticism, but for holy Christian reform!

SPIRITUAL HUNTING.

IF you want to be skilful in spiritual hunting you must hunt in unfrequented and secluded places. Why does the hunter go three or four days in the Pennsylvania forests or over Raquette Lake into the wilds of the Adirondacks? It is the only way to do. The deer are shy, and one "bang" of the gun clears the forest. From the California stage you see, as you go over the plains, here and there a coyote trotting along, almost within range of the gun—sometimes quite within range of it. No one cares for that; it is worthless. The good game is hidden and secluded. Every hunter knows that. So, many of the souls that will be of most worth for Christ, and of most value for the Church, are secluded. They do not come in your way. You will have to go where they are. Yonder they are, down in that cellar, yonder they are, up in that garret. Far away from the door of any church, the Gospel arrow has not been pointed at them. The tract distributor and the city missionary sometimes just catch a glimpse of them, as a hunter through the trees gets a momentary sight of a partridge or roebuck.

The trouble is we are waiting for the game to come to us. We are not good hunters. We are standing in the public street, expecting that the timid antelope will come up and eat out of our hand. We are expecting that the prairie fowl will light on our church-steeple. It is not their habit. If the church should wait ten millions of years for the world to come in and be saved, it will wait in vain. The world will not come. What the church wants now is to lift their feet from damask ottomans, and put them in the stirrups. We want a pulpit on wheels. The church wants not so much cushions as it wants saddle-bags and arrows. We have got to put aside the gown and the kid-gloves, and put on the hunting-shirt. We have been fishing so long in the brooks that run under the shadow of the church that the fish know us, and they avoid the hook, and escape as soon as we come to the bank, while yonder is Upper Saranac and Big Tupper's Lake, where the first swing of the Gospel net would break it for the multitude of the fishes. There is outside work to be done. What is that I see in the backwoods? It is a tent. The hunters have made a clearing and camped out. What do they care if they have wet feet, or if they have nothing but a pine branch for a pillow, or for the northeast storm? If a moose in the darkness steps into the lake to drink, they hear it right away. If a loon cry in the midnight, they hear it. So in the service of God we have exposed work. We have got to camp out and rough it.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

C. W. K., Lansingburgh, N. Y., is requested to send her name and address to this office, in order that letters may be forwarded.

Miss J. E. Lamkin, Champaign Ill. Where can I find information relative to mission work among soldiers and sailors of our country or other countries?

Write to Col. H. H. Hadley, Grand Army Mission, Canal Street, New York, and Manager, Seamen's Mission, 7 Coenties Slip, N.Y.

J. G. Miller, Edgar, Neb. Why is not the name of God in the book of Esther?

It is supposed that the author was fearful of causing offence to persons in the Persian court and possibly provoking a persecution of the Jews who were captives in Persia when it was written.

Earnest Inquirer, Baltimore, Md. Is it a sin for cousins to marry?

There is no authority that we know of for so declaring it. It has been asserted that the children of parents so nearly related are predisposed to insanity, but many physicians dispute the fact.

W. E. Hall, Havensville, Kans. What is the meaning of the word "Cant" 2:15 in the margin of the Oxford Teachers' Bible as a reference from Ezekiel 13:4?

It refers to the Song of Solomon 2:15. It is a contraction of the word, "Canticles," by which name that book is often called. See page 26, the "Helps," in the Oxford Teachers' Bible.

L. J. Guthrie, Wilmington, Del. Did Paul really wish himself accursed, as he says in Rom. 9:3?

No; he simply meant that he so loved his people, the Jews, that if by his own soul's loss they could be saved he would willingly give himself for them. It was merely a strong expression of the sacrifice he would be ready to make for their salvation.

Reader, Gouldsboro, Pa. Please explain apparent contradiction between the fourth and fifth verses of Prov. 26?

The writer appears to mean that there are two ways of answering fool according to his folly, one of which is good and the other bad. If a man answers a fool in the same spirit as his own, lightly and flippantly, he is himself like the fool; but if he meets him on his own ground of folly and shows him the absurdity of the conclusions of his talk, on the same line that mathematicians called the "reduction to the absurd," the fool sees his folly and no longer thinks himself wise.

Subscriber, Gloucester, Mass. When a Christian is visiting another Christian and spending the night with him, ought the host to lead in prayer, or invite his guest to do so, or both kneel in silent prayer?

There is no reason why all three courses should not be taken. The audible prayer would be in the nature of family-prayer and either the host or his guest, or both, might make it. The silent prayer would naturally follow. No Christian would like to dispense with it, nor would he regard a prayer offered by another, or by himself audibly in the presence of others, as taking its place.

Inquirer, Loudon, Ky. There is an apparent contradiction between Rom. 4:3 and James 2:24. Can it be explained?

The two apostles were writing for two different classes of readers both of whom were liable to run to extremes. Paul wished his hearers to understand that good works did not avail to save a man whose heart had not been changed. It was through his faith in Christ that he was accepted and that he could not earn salvation. James, on the other hand, was writing for people who were disposed to do no good works at all, but to rest contented with their own salvation, claiming that faith was sufficient. He told them that such faith did not avail. Faith without works was dead—was in fact no faith at all. The explanation which reconciles the two is that true faith always leads to good works, and if there are no good works we are justified in inferring that the faith is not genuine.

Subscriber, Iowa. Is a person justified in breaking an engagement to be married? If so, what are considered sufficient reasons for so doing? Is it ever justifiable in God's sight?

In our opinion there are many circumstances which would justify the breaking of an engagement. If either party in the closer acquaintance that usually follows an engagement, sees in the other a disposition, or a habit, or a peculiarity of temper, which is likely to lead to unhappiness and disagreement after marriage, the engagement ought to be broken. It is the most stupid folly to enter into matrimony with the knowledge of such circumstances. Better the pain of a broken engagement, than a galling life-long yoke. In marrying another person there need be no fear of its validity in God's sight being impaired by the former engagement. No man or woman, however, who is a Christian, will lightly break an engagement or do it without sincere sorrow.

Charles L. Davis, Crane, Kans. 1. What is the name of the largest steamer afloat? 2. How many hours did Jesus hang on the cross? 3. What authority is there for the statement that the heavenly city will be 1,500 miles square?

1. The Campania of the Cunard line. We do not know the exact dimensions. 2. About six hours. See Mark 15:25, 34, 37. 3. Revelation 21:16. There are eight furlongs to the mile.

Anna Merrill, Elizabeth, N. J. Who first divided the Bible into chapters and verses and when?

It was divided into chapters in the middle of the thirteenth century; some assign it to Cardinal Hugo, some to Stephen Langton. Verses were introduced in the Vulgate by Paginus in 1528, in the English Bible in 1560, and in the Hebrew Bible by Athias of Amsterdam in 1661.

Wm. Clark, Berkley, Cal. Ought fermented or unfermented wine to be used at the Lord's Supper? Which did Christ use?

There is nothing to show which kind Christ used and it does not signify. He merely wished his church to join in a meal, at which his death should be remembered or commemorated. There is no necessity for having the same kind of wine, or the Gospels would have been explicit about it. In present conditions, when there are sometimes persons sitting at the Lord's table who were once drunkards, it is prudent to use unfermented wine, so that the old craving may not be revived by the ordinance.

H. M. Betts, Fairmount, Minn. 1. In what year was the first Bible printed? 2. When was printing invented?

1. It was completed in August 1455, by Gutenburg and Faust. It was a large folio in Latin printed with wooden types at Mainz. It is called the Mazarin Bible from the fact that the only copy known to be in existence was found in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. It was sold for $70,000. 2. There has been a long dispute on the subject. The Encyclopædia Britannica at the close of an exhaustive survey of the various claims says: "As the case stands at present, we have no choice but to say that the invention of printing with movable metal types took place at Haarlem about the year 1445 by Lourens Janszoon Coster."

Mrs. Anna Morton, Lisbon, La. What is meant by the sin against the Holy Ghost mentioned Matt. 12:31, 32?

Many explanations have been offered. That now generally accepted is that it consisted in imputing to satanic power the miracles which Christ performed by the power of the Holy Spirit. The imputation indicated a state of mind and heart so debased and malignant as to put the person making it beyond the reach of pardon. It is a disputed question whether it can be committed in our day. It is very clear, however, that the persons who are distressed by the fear that they have committed it are the least likely to have done so. Their distress is an evidence that they have not fallen into the careless, indifferent condition which they would be in if the Holy Spirit had left them to themselves.

Miss L. A. Robbins, Haverly, Md. In looking over some old cuttings, I find this beautiful definition, which I trust you may deem worthy of republication: "Dependence: The race of mankind would perish if they ceased to aid each other. From the time the mother binds the child's head till the moment that some kind hand wipes the death damp from the brow of the dying, we cannot exist without mutual help. All, therefore, who need have a right to ask it of their fellow mortals. No one who has the power of granting it, can refuse it without guilt."——John Ball, Washington, D.C. Practically so. If you apply to the Missionary Board of the church to which you belong you will obtain the information you ask for. The conditions differ in different churches. Your pastor would be able to give you the address of the Board.——Emily C. Waterhouse, Kennebunk, Me. The reason your question was not answered is that we have been unable to find the passage you refer to. There are only thirteen verses in the fourth chapter of Micah.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE VIKING VISITOR.

NEVER before have the citizens of New York, familiar as they are with the sight of strange craft, seen such a vessel in their harbor as that which came through Hell Gate and down the East River on June 17. She was built of cross-grained oak, with no deck and perfectly straight, seventy-eight feet long and sixteen wide, four feet draught and standing five feet out of the water. From her bow, rose ten feet in the air, a carved dragon's head, with glaring eyes, and at the stern, almost as high, rose the dragon's tail. One mast sixty feet high, supported a square sail of alternate stripes of brown and white canvas. Port-holes were in her sides, but not for guns. Forty oars sixteen feet long were on board to be thrust through the port-holes, and great round shields alternately black and yellow, overlapping each other, were fixed along each side, to protect the heads of the rowers. This boat, as the flag at her mast-head proclaimed, was the Viking from Christiania, Norway. She reached Bergen on April 30 and thence sailed for America, sighting Cape Cod on June 11. She is to go to the World's Fair, and, at its close, will be sold and the proceeds applied to the building of a Seamen's Home in Norway. The interesting feature of this quaint craft is that it is an exact reproduction of a Viking's ship which was dug up at Sandefjord, Norway, a few years ago and is now in the museum at Christiania. That vessel is believed to have been built more than nine hundred years ago. If the Norse sages may be believed, such a vessel as this now in New York harbor reached America 499 years before the fleet commanded by Columbus. A manuscript bearing the date of 1332 records the discovery, more than three hundred years before, by Leif, son of Eric the Red, of land far across the Western seas. Tradition says that Leif was a man of rare accomplishments, that he was converted to Christianity by King Olaf Tryggvason and subsequently preached the Gospel in Greenland. As Prof. Boyesen pointed out, in his address of welcome to Captain Andersen and the eleven sailors who crossed the Atlantic in the Viking, Leif's discovery proved his prowess, but it had no permanent results; it was left for Columbus to give this Continent to the possession of the Old World. In those early days it would not have been possible for many people to go to the New World even if they believed Leif's story; but probably there were not a few who under his preaching found their way to a far more glorious land, the inheritance of the saints in light. (Col. 1: 12.)

The Precaution of the Banks.

THE financial stringency which is now being felt throughout the country, and which has caused the failure of several banks, has led bankers in New York to adopt measures to meet the difficulty. On June 14, they had a meeting at which it was decided to provide for the issue of Clearing House certificates. The object of these certificates is to prevent a bank failing when it is solvent, as banks sometimes do, under a sudden strain. Under the ordinary system a bank is expected to pay in cash, the same day, any balance becoming due from it to another bank. If its customers have withdrawn their deposits, or it has been lending money freely, it may not be able to settle its account so promply, although it may have securities in its safe which would more than cover the amount, if it had time to turn them into money. Under the new arrangement, a bank, so circumstanced, can submit these securities to the Clearing House Committee, who will give to the bank a certificate to the extent of three quarters of their value. These certificates the several banks mutually agree to receive instead of cash, the bank offering them to pay the bank receiving them six per cent interest until they are liquidated. The arrangement seems contrary to the principles on which business is usually conducted. So far from the bankers desiring the failure of their rivals and promoting it, that they may enrich themselves by the extinction of competition, as is the practice in some lines of business, they are helping them to maintain their standing. It is gratifying to notice this spirit of mutual helpfulness and we can but wish that it may be extended not only among business men but in the Church, where above every other place it should be remembered that, "the strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please themselves." (Rom. 15: 1.)

Betrayed by His Voice.

A SINGULAR indictment for murder was found by the Grand Jury of Mobile, Ala., on June 13. The crime was committed twenty-four years ago and had been almost forgotten. It appears that in 1869 two neighbors who lived at Wheelerville, quarrelled on their way home from a trip to Mobile. From words they came to blows and one of them was hurt somewhat severely. He went home, took down his gun and went to his neighbor's house and shot him. The murdered man's servant and his two sons witnessed the deed. The murderer made his escape and succeeded in getting out of the country. Nothing more was heard of him. His victim's wife died and his two sons, who were boys when the crime was committed, grew up stalwart men. The servant in her old age became blind. A few weeks ago the murderer ventured back to his old neighborhood. He was so changed that not even the sons of his victim recognized him. He moved about freely and thought himself safe. But one day, the old blind servant of the man he had killed heard him speak and knew his voice. She called him by his name and demanded his arrest. Amazed and terrified, the criminal fled, but the police are on his track and expect to capture him. No one thinks it unjust that he should be called to account for his crime, in spite of the lapse of time. It is only when our relations with God are in question that repentance and reformation are considered an adequate atonement. The sinner who perceives the eternal principles of justice does not make that mistake, and he finds no peace until he realizes his safety through the propitiation of Christ. (Rom. 3; 25.)

An Ostracized Physician.

AMONG the distinguished visitors to Chicago last week, was Dr. J. C. Majunibar, of Calcutta, who came to attend the World's Medical Congress. He read a paper on the practice of medicine among the ancient Hindoos, in which he showed that the principles now known as homœopathy were accepted and practised by them, as was proved by the ancient records. He said he had found among their archives papers proving that in ordinary chronic cases it was their custom to fight the disease with only one medicine, instead of a combination and only when they were treating acute cases did they give a combination of two or more. The use of metals in medicine as in the present day, was, the doctor said, well understood by the old practitioners. In the course of a conversation, after his lecture, the doctor said that his position in his native land would be greatly changed by his journey. The penalty of crossing the sea, as he had done, was the loss of caste. Although his old patients would call him in professionally, as before, he cannot break bread or sleep in the house of a former associate. Any one who might receive him socially would suffer with him the same penalty of exclusion. This ostracism is much dreaded by the high caste people. A gentleman who had promised to come with him to America, yielded at the last moment to the entreaties of his friends and remained behind. Dr. Majunibar did not appear to dread the penalty. He said that he should be quite as happy, as he would be welcome among those who had already lost caste by travel and in other ways, and he had more in common with them than with those who had maintained their caste. He will have congenial associates who are drawn all the closer together by the common ban upon them. So many men have found when they have been converted and have given up their dissolute companions. It has been better "to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." (Heb. 11:25.)

An International Union.

THE project of a union of all English-speaking nations is discussed by Mr. Carnegie in the current number of the North American Review. He points out many advantages which would result from the combination, which he believes could be made without difficulty. He urges that the representatives of the United States, England and Canada now assembled in Paris to settle the Behring Sea difficulty should meet again in London after their present business is finished, and there devise a scheme for national union. He contends that there are no insurmountable obstacles. It would not take representatives from England a much longer time to reach Washington than it takes representatives from the Pacific slope, and the telegraph would keep all parts of the vast nation in touch and close communication. A nation composed of all English-speaking peoples, Mr. Carnegie declares, "would be unassailable upon land by any power or combination of powers that it is possible to create, and as for the water, the combined fleet would sweep the seas. The new nation would dominate the world and banish from the earth its greatest stain—the murder of man by man. It would be the arbiter between nations and enforce the peaceful settlement of all quarrels." There is little probability of such a union being effected, but all the good that Mr. Carnegie expects would result from it, and more than all, will come from that universal empire which Christ will establish on the earth. A stronger bond than a common language will unite the nations in love of their Lord. (Zech. 14: 9.)

A Modern Alchemist.

A SIGULAR life closed in New York on June 4. It was that of a solitary man, sixty-five years of age, who had given all his efforts, outside his business to an attemptto discover how to make gold. He earned his living by making diamond pointers for use in lithographic work, and being a skilful workman he easily secured an income larger than he needed for his modest wants. He never married, but led a lonely, secret life in lodging-houses. He believed that he had the clue to a chemical process which would turn base metals into gold, and all his money and all his spare time were given to experiments in this pursuit. He was extremely secretive and was tormented by the fear that some one would discover the secret of his formulas. None of his experiments succeeded, but he believed himself perpetually on the eve of discovery which would make him the richest man in the world. He continued to work on, undismayed by his repeated failures, and confident in his belief that success would come some day. The fruits of more than forty years of hard work and study were found in his desolate room after death. They were a few nuggets of yellowish metal, of no value, about the size of walnuts. There can be no doubt that the poor man wasted his life, as many did in olden times, in the same pursuit. Men are generally wiser now and seek the same end of attaining wealth, by other methods. In the light of Christ's teaching, however, the method makes little difference. The man who gives his life to the pursuit of wealth by any method, wastes it. (Matt. 6: 19-20.)

A House Afloat.

THE transportation of a house by water from one site to another, a mile distant, was successfully accomplished on Long Island a few days ago. The house is a large frame building two and a half stories high, seventy feet square and weighing about a hundred and twenty tons. It formerly stood at a place known as Hammel's but it was recently sold to a club, which wanted it located at a more convenient spot. The work of removal has occupied about two weeks. It was undermined and a heavy timbered track was laid to two large scows at the water's edge. An engine dragged the house along the tracks on to the scows at low water. When the tide came in, the scows floated easily bearing the house upon them. A tug pulled them to the place where the house was to stand. Spiles had been driven in to serve as a foundation for it. At high water the scows were anchored close to the spiles, and with jack-screws and a powerful engine the house was lifted from the scows and placed on the spiles. This is said to be the first time that any large building has been successfully removed by water from one site to another. Such a removal is necessarily attended by much risk. That fact is realized by ministers, when they are urged to change the metaphorical standing-ground of the church. They fear that the church itself will fall if an attempt is made to change its position from the old doctrines on which it has rested, to a new creed. There is, however, no ground for apprehension, if in the new situation Jesus Christ, is as of old, "the chief corner-stone" (Eph. 2: 20.)

An Unnatural Sacrifice.

A STRANGE scene was witnessed in St. Paul's Roman Catholic Church at Hancock, N. Y., on June 12. A woman who came from Keeryville, a village seven miles distant, entered the church, carrying her five months' old baby. She looked distressed, but seemed to be perfectly clear in her purpose, whatever it might be. Going up the aisle she ascended the steps of the altar and laid her sleeping child upon it. Then she went across the church to the alcove where there is an image of the Virgin. She knelt before it in prayer for nearly half an hour. Rising suddenly, she returned to the altar and in a loud voice declared that she was about to offer the babe as a sacrifice to God. There were only three persons in the church at the time and they did not fully realize the woman's meaning. But when they saw her seize the babe by the throat and proceed to strangle it, they were horrified. One of the men was at her side in a moment and snatched the child from her grasp. She fought fiercely with him, but was soon overpowered and was detained until a physician could be summoned. He administered a soothing draught which calmed her somewhat and the husband came and took her and their child home. Doubtless the poor creature's mind was unbalanced, or she would not have thought that such a sacrifice was demanded of her, or could benefit her. It may be hoped that if she recovers her reason some Christian will enlighten her, so that she may know that the only sacrifice God requires is a broken and a contrite heart. (Ps. 51: 16, 17.)

BRIEF NOTES.

There are 969 Christian places of worship on the Fiji Islands, and an attendance of 102,000.

Dr. Talmage administered the rite of Baptism by immersion to several candidates on June 19. This is the first ceremony of the kind that has taken place in the new Tabernacle.

Dr. H. Martyn Clark, Amritser, Punjaub, India, writes: "We had about 62,000 patients last year, and this year we shall have about 80,000. I do operations every day. Many are learning to love the Lord through the medical mission.

Thirty thousand copies of separate Gospels will be despatched from the Bible Society in London for Uganda, during this month of June. The Society pays the freight as far as Zanzibar. The British Government has declared a Protectorate of the country on the recommendation of Sir Gerald Porter

The rescue work in Philadelphia which has hitherto been carried on at 3345 Market St., has removed to more commodious quarters on the corner of Wallace and 35th Sts. This work, which is undenominational, has been very successful and had outgrown its quarters. Rev. John C. Keller is the pastor.

The American Home Missionary Society has changed its name to comply with the condition on which Mr. Stickney of Baltimore, bequeathed it $150,000 recently. It will in future be known as the Congregational Home Missionary Society. There will be no change in its management or methods.

Contributions to the fund for liquidating the debt on the Brooklyn Tabernacle have been received since our acknowledgement last week as follows: Furrar Washington, Paulina, Ia., $1.; Mark Hubbard, Maxwell, Cal., $1.; Miss Sarah Clark, Lowell, Mass., $1., F. W. Culbertson, New Rome, Minn., $1.25.

Dr. Edward Payson Thwing the famous missionary to Canton, China, is dead. A cable message announcing the sad fact came on June 14. It was at first supposed that the death was that of his wife who was known to be sick. A cable message of inquiry, however, elicited confirmation of the first message. It stated that Dr. Thwing died of typhoid fever.

The Taylor University of Fort Wayne, Ind., has conferred the degree of Doctor of Philosophy on Rev. Chandler A. Oakes, formerly of Philadelphia, who is now Dr. Talmage's assistant pastor at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. A portrait of Dr. Oakes and a sketch of his life appeared in this journal on June 14. The same university last year conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws on Dr. Talmage.

Rev. Arthur Crane, of Saco, Me., has resigned his pastorate that he may return to the evangelistic field in which he has had a long and successful experience. Mr. Crane's resignation takes effect in September and he will be pleased to receive applications for service after that date. He holds commendatory letters from pastors of Baptist Congregational and Presbyterian Churches who testify to the valuable help they have received from him in the past.

A recent despatch to the American Israelite from Jerusalem announces that the Sultan has renewed licenses of Jewish real estate brokers which have been suspended for some time. They are now at liberty to sell land to Jewish settlers. The taxes on such property are five times as heavy as they were twenty years ago. Baron Ed. Rothschild has, however, advanced to the government a sufficient sum to pay the taxes on land held by the poorer class of Jews for several years to come.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE POISONED REPAST.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, June 25, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: "And [Elisha] said unto his people, Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets. And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not. So they poured out for the men to eat. And it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. And they could not eat thereof." II Kings 4: 40.

THIS text and its context bring Elisha before us in beautiful relations to young men and to the kingdom of God. He is presented to us as he moves among the sons of the prophets as a skilful teacher, a sincere friend, and an honored father. He is a pioneer in the department of theological instruction; he is a forerunner of the professors and presidents in our modern theological seminaries. There never was a time in the church of God when it was not the duty of religious teachers to provide for the training of their successors. Similar obligations rest upon the ministry of to-day. It is quite as much a part of our duty to assist in the training of young men for the ministry as it is to preach the Gospel or to perform any kind of pastoral work. The ministry is derelict in a part of its duty if it fails to pray and to labor that the Lord may send forth young men as toilers in his vineyard. Every pastor should be in a sense a theological professor, and every church a theological seminary. Indeed, pastors and churches are such professors and theological seminaries for truth or error, whether or not they are conscious of the fact. Any man who listens for a score of years to an intelligent preacher or pastor ought to be able to pass a good examination on the fundamental doctrines of our holy faith.

Elisha, whose life was almost constant sunshine and benediction, never appears more appropriately in his true character than when he is giving instruction to these young students of theology as a teacher, and when he is providing for their daily wants as a father. We learn from the connection that the time here mentioned was a period of Dearth in the Land.

It is not at all improbable that it was the time of scarcity which is mentioned in the first and second verses of the eight chapter of this book. If so, then it was the time when Elisha gave information to the Shunammite woman of the coming of this famine. The famine of which he thus prophesied lasted for seven years. This woman followed the suggestion of Elisha and sojourned in the land of the Philistines for that period. The famine did not apparently reach that land, or at least it was not so serious as in Israel. It was a much more severe famine at least so far as its length was concerned, than that which occurred in the time of Elijah; for that famine was but three and a half years, while this one, as we have seen, continued for seven years. This was a famine of bread; but it was not, as was the former one, also a famine of the Word of God. We have two striking illustrations in the narrative of the care of the prophet concerning the food of the students who were under his care. Elisha was a broad man. His care for the physical wants of his students is worthy of all imitation. The true minister of Christ must be interested in all that concerns those over whom he is placed as a minister. Concerning no interest of his people can he afford to be indifferent. Twice our Lord fed the multitudes with the bread of this life; but it is true that his ultimate purpose was to feed their souls with the bread which cometh down from heaven. His miracles have been called "the great bell before the sermon" to summon the people to listen to the words of life. The church of to-day must in like manner care for the physical needs, and also meet the intellectual wants of the people, and thus the better prepare them to receive the Gospel message.

The two miracles performed in connection with the events here recorded concerned the sons of the prophets in their organized capacity. The first two miracles mentioned in this chapter, the increase of the oil and the restoration of the child of the Shunammite woman, referred to individual servants of God; but the other two miracles, the removal of the poisonous element from the pottage and the increase of the loaves of barley, referred to the entire body of the sons of the prophets. These two latter miracles join themselves appropriately to the two earlier recorded in this chapter. The two earlier give us a charming inside picture of the daily life and fraternal associations of these students in the school of the prophets; and they also greatly strengthen our faith in God, whose servant Elisha was, and who by the instrumentality of this servant showed his tender care for the physical wants as well as the spiritual necessities of these young men.

The Chief of the College.

We see that Elisha here transforms a hurtful vegetable into healthful food. He was now at Gilgal. He had been there a short time before in company with Elijah, a little time previous to Elijah's ascension. Here, as we have seen, there was a school of the sons of the prophets. In their society Elisha took great pleasure; he was alike their teacher in things spiritual and their provider and father in things temporal. Theological students, as a rule, need help in both these respects. Somehow, doubtless for wise purposes, God does not call many millionaires to be ministers of the Gospel. The Church still has to assist in making provision for the support of her young ministers. The nation does not think that she dishonors herself by providing schools, teachers, educational apparatus, appropriate uniforms, and all other expenses for the students at West Point and Annapolis; and the students in these institutions do not feel that they have dishonored their manliness as candidates for military service by accepting the bountiful provision of the nation. Where the nation gives ten dollars to help young soldiers, the Church does not give even one dollar to train her young ministers; and by accepting this ecclesiastical pittance our theological students often subject themselves to the harsh criticism of cold-hearted Christians. The Church, however, must continue to act toward her young students the part which Elisha performed toward his in that early day. We see him now at one of the times when he was to give them lessons suited to their work. Studiously and affectionately they are gathered about their honored and beloved teacher. Unfortunately the severe famine is still in the land. The wants of these students are very few; and they are willing to make even unreasonable sacrifices for the opportunity to study the truths of God as made known by the revered servant of God. But it is difficult for them to secure the supply for even their modest wants in this time of prolonged and severe famine. Their case is touching indeed. It appeals to our hearts as we read the story in this remote country and distant century. It touched the heart of Elisha.

Provision for Body and Soul.

We see by the narrative that he commands his servant, who was probably Gehazi of subsequent unsavory memory, to "set on the great pot and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets." A modest meal indeed these students of theology were to have as they feasted on their stewed pottage, prepared in the great caldron. Again we are reminded of Elisha's tender care for the needs of the body, while he was feeding the intellectual and spiritual nature of his students. The body is the Lord's, and as the Lord's servant he would care for all that belonged to his Master. Christ came not to save the soul as distinct from the body, but to save the entire man, body and soul, from sin and sorrow here and from suffering hereafter. He came to make body, soul, and spirit the willing servant of God on earth and the joyous resident with God forever in heaven.

It would seem that several of the students went out in the field to gather herbs, vines, and gourds into their blankets as the word means rather than laps, to be shredded for the pot, or caldron, of pottage. There was no meat in our sense of the word, and no mention is made of bread in connection with their food. One of the number who went out to gather herbs brought in by mistake some poisonous, or at least noxious, herb in his blanket. The nature of this herb perhaps it is needless for us to stop to discuss at length. It is supposed by many to have been coloquintida, the fruit of a plant of the same name. Its fruit is said to be about the size of a large orange. Sometimes it is called the bitter apple, as both the seeds and the pulp are intensely bitter. Judiciously used it is valuable for its medicinal qualities, but it is ordinarily placed among vegetable poisons. Gathered thus carelessly, it was put into the pot along with the other herbs. The fires were lighted and the process of stewing begun and continued. Soon it was announced that the food was ready for the humble repast. No sooner had the pottage been tasted than the unusual bitterness startled the hungry students. The presence of this dangerous plant was thus discovered and at once the students cried out, "O, thou man of God, there is death in the pot." This was certainly

A Providential Discovery.

We may pause a moment at this point in the story to emphasize some of the applications which the narrative here suggests. The table is still often a snare to usefulness, and not infrequently to life itself. Death still lurks in many a pot. The intoxicating cup has destroyed more lives than the sword. Intoxicating drink is still Satan's strongest ally among the children of men. Other evils have slain their thousands; drink has slain its tens and hundreds of thousands. A great army of drunkards daily marches through the land on its way to dishonored graves. It is accompanied in its march to the tomb by bruised lives and breaking hearts; it is a sight which well-nigh breaks the heart of all thoughtful observers. We license men to recruit victims for this heart-breaking and often heart-broken army; we trifle with the tippling which so often sows the seeds of which drunkenness, in all its horrid debauchery, is the ripened fruit. Oh, that God would give us some Elisha to take the poison out of this pot! Oh, that God would make us wise in the example we set, in the instruction we give, and in the laws we enact, so that this army beating "funeral marches to the grave" may no longer be recruited and this gigantic evil may be banished from our land.

Mental Poisons.

There is also many an intellectual pot in which there is death to all that is noblest and loftiest in life. The mind, as truly as the heart, was made for God, and only as the intellect is inspired by and consecrated to God does it reach its loftiest possibilities. The plant of scepticism and the weed of atheism have poisoned every pot into which they have been cast. They have robbed life of its noblest inspiration; death of its sublime support, and eternity of its immortal hope. The man who puts these plants into the pot of life is the enemy of the republic, the enemy of the race, and the enemy of his God. Truth is the soul's heavenly food; feeding on error it weakens, sickens and dies. Truth, in the end, must triumph over every form of error; truth assuredly shall eventually come down from the cross and shall ascend the throne. But in the meantime the poisonous plants of error and sin will find their victims among our noblest youth, and will hold as slaves some men and women whose pens are facial and whose tongues are eloquent. God in heaven, make the day of truth's triumph to come speedily, and make that triumph complete throughout the world!

There is sometimes death in the ecclesiastical pot. This pot, as stewed in some theological seminaries and Christian pulpits, is a strange mixture of herbs of criticism, vines of fancy, and gourds of scepticism. When men preach a gospel which is not a gospel, when they put human opinion in the place of divine revelation, when they give us their own fancy instead of God's truth, they offer to dying men a pot in which there is not the bread of life. When men give us "eisegesis," which is the putting into the Bible of their own wish, instead of exegesis, which is the getting out of the Bible God's thought as there divinely written, they put death into their theological pot. When men strive to be wise above what is written, they usually end by being ignorant below what is written. When men take away our Lord from their preaching, they take away our hope, our joy, our life, our all. Some time ago, pinned to the pulpit cushion of a scholarly but technical, theological, cold-hearted and unsympathetic preacher, was a piece of paper on which were written the words, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." The words went straight to the heart of the preacher as he took up the piece of paper. They led him to thoughtfulness and prayerfulness; they induced him to preach Christ and him crucified as never before in his ministry. His whole soul glowed with the new life which he had received, and his sermons exalted Christ in all the tenderness of his love as the only hope of lost men and women. Entering his pulpit some time after he found another slip of paper on which were the words, "Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord." All disciples of Christ are glad when they see their Lord and Master. No preacher can deeply, truly and permanently touch the hearts of men in their varied experiences, in their longings for light and life, in their disappointments with themselves and the world, except he lift up Christ before their weary hearts. The old gospel has not lost its power. An uplifted Christ is still the mightiest magnet to draw men from self and sin to holiness and heaven. Christ's words, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," are as true to-day as when he uttered them while entering the shadows of the garden and the cross. If Christ were thus tenderly, lovingly, triumphantly and constantly lifted up in the pulpit, men, women and children would oftener be drawn to the pews and eventually be drawn to the feet and to the heart of this exalted Christ.

The Antidote.

In the narrative before us we see that Elisha was equal to the emergency. Men who have God on their side can do all which the providence of God may require at their hands. Such men are never wholly at a loss under any circumstances. "Bring meal," said Elisha. The meal is brought. He casts it into the stew in the pot; then he said, "pour out for the people that they may eat." They poured out; the people ate; and there was no harm in the pot. On a former occasion he healed the bitter waters with salt; now he heals the bitter herbs with meal. The meal, doubtless was only the sign of healthful food, and Elisha only the channel through which God wrought.

From this quaint narrative we may learn some suggestive lessons. Let us guard against death in the pot. God makes every sin a proof of its own bitterness and folly, as he makes every sense in the body a sentinel against danger. A second lesson is that we should recognize God as the fountain of all life and blessing. He it is that always healeth us; he it is that always taketh death out of the pot and keepeth us in life and health. Do you recognize him in all your ways? Did you, at least in your heart, recognize him in your food to-day? Have you bowed the knee to him as the giver of every good and perfect gift? Is God thought to be good in all the events of life? Lastly, remember, that only his grace can turn human bitterness into divine sweetness. He alone can change the bitterness of Marah into waters of sweetness. Sin cherished is unspeakable bitterness; sin forgiven leads to an experience of divine

Sweetness in the Soul.

Sorrow unsanctified is bitterness unqualified; sorrow submissively accepted is joy unlimited. Jesus Christ is the true Elisha. Let him to-day come into the soul that the poison of life may be removed and the bitterness of earthly experience be transformed into the sweetness and blessedness of heaven even now.

We have put heaven too far away. More and more ought we to emphasize the possibility of having heaven here and now. The apostle John addresses us as the sons of God while we are upon the earth. The whole aim of Christianity, when understood in its full and truest meaning, is to give us much of heaven during our earthly life. Our Lord taught us to pray "Thy kingdom come." The answer to this prayer is certainly that the kingdom of God should be established upon this earth. The entire aim of the Church should be the realization of that prayer in the introduction and establishment of this kingdom. Indeed, we can never enter heaven there and then, except heaven enter us here and now. The Church has lost power by neglecting, to so great a degree, the teaching of this truth. We have filled men's minds with a dreamy conception of heaven at some remote time and in some distant sphere; we ought rather to show that such a heaven is simply the full fruition of religious principles operating in our characters while we are upon the earth. A similar law applies to hell as to heaven. Men go into perdition at the last because they are partially in perdition now, and perdition is partially in them here and now. Only as the grace of God comes into the heart to drive out the bitterness and poison of earth's noxious plants and so transform the soul into the image of Christ, can we expect to see Christ at the last and be like him and dwell forever with him. May God give us foretastes of this life here and now.

The Worship of "Kwanon."

One of the Most Peculiar of China's many Idolatries.

NCE a year the people about Swatow, in China, go to a temple on a small island near-by to worship the Chinese "queen of heaven," to whom mercantile men think they owe their success upon sea and land. Miss Daniels, a missionary at Swatow, who visited the temple, describes in the Gospel in all Lands, the temple, the idol, and the worship:

"The temple dedicated to the goddess stands high, and is reached by a flight of stone steps. It is highly ornamented in flowers, fowls, fishes, and beasts, the ridge-pole being crowned by a great dragon. A noisy theatre operates a few feet in front of the steps, and on all sides are people with the tables for supplying food or mock money. Going up the steps one sees directly in front of the temple an altar for making offerings to the spirits of such of the departed as have no children to worship them. To the right of this is a huge paper image, its head as high as the top of the temple, its face and hands as hidous as you can imagine. This is the ruler of these departed spirits, and it is his duty to settle disagreements among those spirits who are inclined to quarrel. To the left of the altar is a furnace, in which bushels of ashes and embers show that during the past two days great quantities of mock money have been offered.

"Within the temple, at the farther end, sits the goddess in her chair, with a heavy canopy above, all elaborately wrought in silk. With her attendant on either side she is quite unmindful of the earnestness with which two devotees are tossing their bamboo slips, eagerly watching for the favorable position of one black and one white side up, to show that their petition will be granted. In front of the goddess is a row of three altars, each about ten feet long and three wide. One is covered with lighted tapers and incense pots, in which incense sticks are burning, filling the building with smoke. The others are loaded with mock money and all kinds of food brought for offerings. Here are the entire heads of swine stained a bright pink and roasted, fowls of all kinds, fish of all kinds, and the best of fruits, all of which are offered, then taken home and eaten by the family.

"Beyond these altars are mats upon which the worshippers kneel after having made their offerings; and gongs are beaten with a deafening noise while they prostrate themselves before the idol.

"We turn aside and wander a short distance from the temple, where we find a number of women whom we tell of our God. Some listen, others examine our dress and inquire after our families. When we ask them regarding their worship, the greater number acknowledge that the goddess can hear nothing, can say nothing, and can in no way help them, and they worship because it is their custom. Others say they did not come to worship, but are out for pleasure; others hold that the goddess does help them. Thus, we spend four hours talking with these poor women; and hope that some may have heard the Gospel, to accept it in the future."

SOFTENED BY A CHILD.

THE Rev. Marcus Rainsford, an English pastor, writes: "I was once asked to go and see a prominent man and tell him about Christ. He did not expect me, and when I went he was very angry, and nearly turned me out of the house. He was an old man, and had one little daughter. A few weeks afterwards he went to the Continent, and his daughter went with him. One day when he was very ill he saw his daughter looking at him, while the tears rolled down her cheeks. 'My child,' he said, 'what are you crying about?' 'Oh, papa, you do not love the Lord Jesus Christ! I am afraid you are going to hell.' 'Why do you say that?' 'Do you not remember when Mr. Rainsford called to see you, you were very rude to him? I never saw you so angry. And he only wished to speak to you about Jesus.' If that man has gone to heaven—I do not say whether he has or not—the only light he had, he got from his child. You cannot tell me what may be the result, by the blessing of God, from a word spoken in season. God can use any instruments, however feeble to effect his purposes, and, so he may have used this child."

SPRINGS OF COMFORT.

IF other hearts can be made glad,
And other lives become less sad,
By words which I have spoken,
Much comfort it may bring to me,
And in some measure I shall see
Why my own heart was broken.

If other hearts shall beat more true
And other lives be filled anew
With strength to bear their burden,
Because my life reveals the trace
Of trials borne with patient grace,
I'll ask no fairer guerdon.

If through my sorrow I shall learn
The way to comfort those that yearn
For pity, true and tender;
Though helpless on a couch of pain,
Though naught but broken plans remain,
Sweet service I may render.

If God's great name be glorified
Through lives which have been purified
By fires of deep affliction,
What seems but loss may be rich gain
And disappointment, grief, and pain
Shall prove a benediction

Then, unto me, O Lord, I pray,
Give strength and patience day by day,
To bear without repining,
The chastisement which must be right,
Because my soul, in thy pure sight,
Like silver, needs refining. "C."

WORK FOR JESUS.

'TIS sweet to work for Jesus,
In this life's little day;
To spread around "the joyful sound,"
As those forgiven may:
No action is too lowly,
No work of love too small;
If Christ but lead, we may, indeed,
Well follow such a call.

'Tis sweet to work for Jesus,
While our weak spirits rest
In his own care, safe sheltered there,
And with his presence blessed.
Hold on unmoved and patient,
Till he shall call thee home,
With joy to stand at God right hand,
To serve before the throne.

THE SWEETEST LIVES.

THE sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deed, both great and small,
Are close knit strands of an unbroken thread
Where love ennobles all. [bells,
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no
The Book of Life the shining record tells.

Thy love shall chant its own beatitudes
After its own life-working. A child's kiss
Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;
A sick man help'd by thee will make thee strong;
Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
Of service which thou renderest.

THE SEVENTIETH WEEK.

The Last Week of Daniel's Heptads or Seventy Weeks of Years.

BY THOMAS NEWBERRY.

THE prophecy of Daniel to which our Lord refers (Matt. 24: 15-31) is thus recorded in Daniel 9: 27: "And he shall confirm the covenant with many (a covenant with the many) for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate (and upon the wing abominations making desolate) even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate (desolator).

The prince that shall come, whose people (the Roman people) had destroyed the city and the sanctuary (v. 26), is the last head of the Roman Empire, the lawless one, the little horn of Daniel 7: 8. He, in the providence of God, will allow the people of Israel to return to their own land, will acknowledge their nationality as a distinct people, will reinstate them in Jerusalem as their metropolis, will permit them to have their temple and their sacrifices. He, the prince, will confirm a covenant with Israel for one week, guaranteeing them their national privileges for seven years, but in the midst of the week he breaks the covenant, takes away the daily sacrifice, and sets up the abomination of desolation in the holy place. There is no building on earth now which can be called the Temple of God, but then II. Thess. 2: 4 will be fulfilled, when he, the son of perdition, opposing and exalting himself above all that is called God, will sit in the Temple of God.

The first three and a half years of this last seventieth week of years will be occupied by the lawless one in the establishment of his kingdom, as shown by the vision of the four horses in Rev. 6: 1-8, the opening of the four seals. The rider on the white horse, the lawless one, does not wear the diadem or royal crown, but the "stephanos," the victor's crown awarded him by the people. He goes forth conquering and to conquer; the result of which is warfare, symbolized by the red horse, followed by the black horse of famine, and the pale horse of pestilence and death. Thus the judgments mentioned by the Lord (Matt. 24: 1-14), as characterizing the present dispensation, will in their exact order follow one another in that first half of the week. Matt. 24: 15, brings us to this period in the half of the week, when the prince, having broken the covenant, sets up the abomination in the holy place; and then begins that fearful persecution of which Daniel and our Lord speak, lasting three and a half years.

The disciples to whom the Lord spoke were the godly remnant of Israel at that time, and as such received instruction for the remnant of the latter day; hence the Lord addresses them, giving counsel for that time, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day" (v. 20.)

The reason is given in verses 21, 22: "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." This tribulation cannot be referred to any persecution of Christians during the Christian era, for none of them were unparalleled.

Neither can it refer to the trials and afflictions of Christians extended over the whole period, since it is distinctly limited to a definite time. This time of the great tribulation is variously described, that we make no mistake as "time" (one year), "times" (two years) and "half a time" (six months), or three years and a half, consisting of forty and two months, or one thousand two hundred and threescore days. During this period the lawless one takes the place of God; Satan is cast out of the heavenlies, and with his angels comes down to the earth, having great wrath; Babylon is drunken with the blood of the saints; and those who will not worship the beast or receive his mark, but who confess the Christ of God, are either killed, boycotted, or driven to the ends of the earth. The signs wrought by the false prophet will be so stupendous, and the forces brought to bear so great, that nothing but the sovereign and almighty grace of God will be sufficient to preserve the souls of men from the strong delusion and its eternal consequences. In the grace of God this state of things is limited to the definite period already mentioned.

The signs in the heavens mentioned in Matt. 24: 29, 30, usher in the august day of Jehovah, spoken of by the ancient prophets, the day of Christ, the manifestation of the Son of Man in power and great glory, when he comes to put down all his enemies.

HOW TO MEET TROUBLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 9. Acts 16: 23-25; II Corinthians 7: 5-7

MEETING trouble in any way is not always a wise thing to do, although the practice is a common one. Many a Christian has suffered unnecessary anxiety and pain by looking forward and grappling with difficulties and trials which never came. Like the women, as they went to the sepulchre, they have said, "who shall roll away the stone for us?" and when they arrived they found that the stone was rolled away. A more useful question about trouble—and possibly that was the one intended by the persons who select the topics—is how to bear trouble. There are few people who have not, at some period of their lives, had occasion for knowledge on that subject. Bereavement, sickness, disappointment, slander, financial trial, are all arrows in the quiver of the enemy, and God allows one or more to strike the Christian in his way through the world. The Christian is nowhere promised immunity from affliction, but he is promised strength and grace to bear it and also that he shall not have more laid upon him than he is able to bear. From both promises comfort may be derived. The consciousness that God knows of his trial and permits it, is alone a source of consolation. The reason for it may not be clear and even the object of it may not be understood, but he who walks by faith, not by sight, is satisfied that both are right. The boy who struggles with mathematical problems, or the intricacies of a dead language, and does not see how either can be of any use to him in life, is expected to continue the struggle, and to be assured that the discipline is useful to him and will fit him to overcome difficulties that he will have to meet. At least as much confidence, God is justified in expecting from his children. From that standpoint the Christian may look upon his trials with calmness and courage. He may even rejoice that God is testing his faith and love and take a holy pride in undergoing the process. The tree which the winds assail becomes strong and its roots take firmer hold; the stone which the mason carves, or the lapidary polishes, becomes more beautiful and so may strength and beauty of character come to one who passes through the trying ordeal of affliction. But those blessings do not come to one who frets or repines under the discipline. They come to those who, like the apostle in prison, rejoice and sing praises to God. Thus trial becomes an opportunity to be welcomed and accepted cheerfully. It gives the sufferer the opportunity to prove the sincerity of his faith, which must be a result well pleasing to God; and it also serves as an object lesson to the world, proving to unbelievers that religion is a real and sure blessing since it supports the believer in his [illegible]

THE GREAT EPWORTH LEAGUE CONFERENCE.

CLEVELAND is this week the Mecca of the young people of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The day after the date of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the first International Conference of the Epworth League will convene in the Music Hall of that city. A picture of this enormous building from a photograph by the Edmonson Company appears on this page. With this also we print a picture [illegible] to every member of the League. It is that of the little room in the old Central Methodist Episcopal Church of Cleveland in which the first Epworth League was organized. Little idea was there at that time that the room was to become ever memorable as the birthplace of so mighty an organization as that whose hosts this week gather in the city to celebrate their first anniversary conference. Four days will be devoted to the Conference and they will be days of rich blessing to all who have the privilege of being present. The first day, Thursday June 29, is to be given up to the subject of Social Work. Gov. McKinley and the Mayor of Cleveland are expected to be at the afternoon meeting and welcome the delegates respectively for the State and City. Responses are to be made by Bishop A. W. Wilson of the M. E. Church South, Dr. A. Carman, General Superintendent of the Methodist Church of Canada, and Bishop N. Fitzgerald, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A Praise Service will follow, led by Mr. H. V. Holt, President of the Illinois State League. At eight o'clock Dr. W. A. Candler, President of Emory College, Oxford, Ga., will preach, and Secretary Schell will give an address.

The subjects for Friday will be the Junior League and the Literary Departments. Rev. Henry C. Jennings, of Minnesota, will preside at the first meeting at 9.30 A. M. Among the speakers on the Junior League will be Mrs. Howard H. Scribner, Mrs. Myra G. Plautz and Rev. E. M. Mills, D.D., of Elmira, N.Y. At eleven o'clock there will be a reception of messengers from other young people's societies, at which Bishop W. X. Ninde will preside. At the afternoon session the President will be W. G. E. Cunnyngham, Secretary of the Epworth League of the M. E. Church, South. Papers will be read as follows: "Education by Observation," by Dr. Robert R. Doherty, of New York; "Reading Courses and Lectures," by Prof. W. H. Crawford, of Gammon Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Ga.; "Periodical Literature," by Rev. H. M. Du Bose, D.D.; "Devotional Culture," by Rev. John V. Smith, D.D., of Toronto. At the evening session the subject of the Epworth League in Colleges will be considered. The speakers will be Dr. Bradford P. Raymond, of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., Rev. Collins Denny, D.D., of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., and Rev. I. Shaw, LL.D., of Wesleyan Theological Seminary, Montreal.

On Saturday the important department of Mercy and Help is to occupy the attention of the Conference. A sunrise prayer meeting at six o'clock opens the day's proceedings. At the morning session the speakers are to be Rev. William N. Brodbeck, D.D., of Boston; Rev. Earl Cranston, D.D., of Cincinnati; Mrs. Lucy R. Meyer of Chicago, and Mrs. Jane B. Robinson of Detroit. The subjects for the afternoon session will be the sub-departments of work, Temperance and city Evangelization. On the former the speakers will be Judge E. H. Nast of Nashville, Tenn., and ex-Governor Will Cumback of Indiana. On the latter subject addresses will be given by Hugh Price Hughes of London, Rev. Louis A. Banks of Boston and others. The evening will be a Foreign Mission Session. Bishop Thoburn of India, Dr. Alexander Sutherland of the Canadian Church, Dr. W. R. Lambuth of the Southern Church, and Dr. C. C. McCabe of New York will be speakers.

On Sunday the first meeting will be the Reunion and Love feast at the Epworth Memorial Church for the organizers of the League. Mr. Willis W. Cooper of St. Joseph, Mich., will preside. In the same church at eleven o'clock the Conference Sermon will be preached by Bishop H. W. Warren. Three mass-meetings are to be held in the afternoon. At that in the Music Hall Dr. Homer Eaton will preside and addresses will be given by Rev. R. N. Burns, of the Methodist Church of Canada; Rev. Page Milburn, of Baltimore, Md.; Rev. H. S. Werlein, D. AMONG THE ORDERS.

Christian Endeavor is making considerable progress in Dublin. Branches have recently been started in Brighton-road and Sandy Mount Methodist Churches.

A local union has been formed in Vancouver, British Columbia, of four Endeavor Societies and three Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor. Mrs. J. J. Banfield is president.

A Young Women's Christian Association has been organized at Tung Cho, China. It holds Bible classes, Devotional meetings, Mothers' meetings and has arranged for systematic missionary work. Miss Luella Miner is the Secretary.

Mr. Eli T. Allen, of Oroomiah, Persia, who was formerly a member of the King St., Christian Endeavor Society at London, Ont., reports a young men's C. E. Society with five active and two associate members in his school at Oroomiah.

A letter has been received from Miss Esmark, Secretary of the Young Women's Christian Associations of Sweden and Norway, Unge Kvinder's Kristelige Samfund, stating that as many girls and young women of those countries are now here or are coming, any kindnesses or courtesies extended to them by the Associations here will be heartily appreciated.

The Anglo-American Y. M. C. A, 160 Rue Montmarte, Paris, are having good times at their Sunday afternoon Bible class. Major-General McCausland, Mr. George Williams, and others have recently conducted it. All bear testimony to the great value of such an institution for English and American young men who are alone in the gay city.

Secretary Baer of the Christian Endeavor Society has been rebresented as boycotting the World's Fair on behalf of the C. E. Societies, on account of Sunday opening. He has been misrepresented. He says: "The United Society has not issued any 'boycott;' or any order to individuals to 'stay away.' Having no authority of any kind over the local Societies, it could not if it so desired, and it does not so desire. Individuals are expected to settle this matter for themselves. While I have firm convictions, and can plainly see my duty as an individual plainly marked out, and have always let people know just where I stand, I desire to respect the opinions of others, and do not applaud the spirit that would attempt to dictate to the consciences of men. In this day and age we are all able to think for ourselves."

A Great Moslem Temple.

The Mosque of Omar and its Traditions — Rural Pilgrims—The Character of Omar

DURING their recent tour in Palestine, the editor and proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD visited, among other famous places, the great Mosque of Omar on the site of Solomon's Temple on Mount Moriah, and which is justly regarded as the most magnificent building in the City of David. There are few structures, either ancient or modern, that are held in such reverence. Here, say the adherents of Mohammed, the great prophet ascended to heaven, and their traditions tell that the print of his sandalled foot is still seen on the rock from which he took his final flight.

Some thirty years ago, it was strictly forbidden that any one, not a Moslem, should enter the mosque, or even tread on the ground on which it stands. This rule, however, has been relaxed, and nowadays pilgrims of any creed are allowed to enter, first of course, paying a "backsheesh" to the officials. As to travellers, the consuls of the various countries usually secure permission for them to visit the mosque. The consul sends a dragoman with an official letter to the "Mutasarif" (governor), who directs the party in charge of the El-Haram to recieve the strangers. Visitors have to discard their shoes at the threshold. Except in cold weather, the court-yard of the mosque is always crowded, some of the visitors being mere curiosity-seekers, and others students, who pore over the pages of the Koran with the design of consecrating themselves to religious duties. The square is one of the pleasantest places in the city, being exposed to the exhilarating breezes that come from the direction of the Mount of Olives.

Religious services are held unceasingly in the mosque. On festivals, such as the "great feast" (the first after Ramadan, the "fasting month"), the mosque of Omar, is the gathering place of many thousands of the country people, who come there once a year for worship and pleasant excursions. They linger around the mosque during the day and find a shelter with some acquaintance overnight.

On their homeward journey, these rural pilgrims, especially the women, sing the songs of joy peculiar to the Moslems, in which they celebrate their visit to "the rock," from the top of which they believe their prophet took his way to heaven. This rock, they declare, is suspended between heaven and earth, being literally supported in air.

Our illustration shows the mosque as it now appears, in a state of partial decay. The gate to the right is the main entrance, and adjoins the western wall of the city, known as "the wailing place of the Jews." Several "dacroories" (black men from the Soudan), are posted at the different corners of the mosque to prevent the intrusion of "unbelievers" and to check disorder of any kind. They are paid from the "mosque fund." The mosque is very rich, its guardians controlling the revenues from many buildings that belong to the Moslem church, and which devout Moslems have bequeathed to it. Some wealthy Mohammedans have left their entire property, "in the name of the prophet," to this temple.

Omar, Abu-Hafsa Ibn-al-Khatab, was the second of the great Moslem Caliphs, and lived in the sixth century. He was the third cousin of Abdallah, the father of Mohammed, and in his early career was a violent enemy of the prophet, but afterwards became a stanch friend. After Mohammed's death, Omar caused Abubekr to be proclaimed Caliph, and himself became prime minister, afterwards succeeding to the Caliphate. In his reign, Syria was conquered for the Crescent, Jerusalem was besieged and captured and the keys of the Holy City were handed to Omar in person by the messenger of Sophronius the high priest. He spared the lives of the inhabitants, and granted them religious liberty. All the other important cities of Palestine capitulated in rapid succession. Omar's nature, however, was severe and not all were dealt with as leniently by his victorious armies as the people of Jerusalem. Many stories of his remarkable sense of justice are preserved in Moslem literature. He was assassinated in the mosque at Medina by a Persian slave named Abu Lulu Firuz and was buried in that city close to the tombs of Mohammed and Abu-Bekr. Omar was the first ruler who kept armies under pay, and assigned pensions to faithful public servants. He is also said to have been the first to establish a municipal police force and to promulgate laws defining the relations and the responsibilities of masters and servants. Thus, in some sense he was a public benefactor, but his frightful career of sanguinary conquest and slaughter is one of the saddest pictures in the world's history.

Womanly Dignity.

THE woman of great dignity is a power greater than one positively aggressive—she can influence where much talking and many threats will not prevail. She can make the thoughtless girl think, and the rude boy feel that his slang and rough manners are not, after all, as interesting as he supposed them to be. Her dignity diffuses itself like the perfume of a rose—you delight in it as much as you respect it. It is a safeguard against all unpleasantness, and no one is foolhardy enough to attempt to break down a barrier which has its foundations so well placed. It is gentle dignity. It is perfect virtue that results from the mingling of gentleness and self-respect, with an atom of consideration thrown in to make the different parts mingle perfectly, and make a delightful type of womanhood.

Song in the Household.

MANY a home where there is little of beauty, or ease, or luxury, is made pleasant by "thanksgiving and the voice of melody." If there is joy in the heart and music on the tongue, many rough places in life are smoothed and made plain, many dark spots are brightened and made cheerful. Those families which know nothing of sacred song, miss some of the purest pleasure that falls to the lot of mortals.

Family prayers is a duty and a privilege, but family praise is none the less so, and there is nothing that binds hearts more closely to the home than those "songs which mother sang;" and in the old tunes in which the voice of parents and brothers and sisters join, form a bond of union which unites hearts when mountains rise and oceans roll between them. Sometimes the wayward son, wandering in a far-off land, hears the song his mother sang, and is charmed by its music to know and serve his mother's God. Careful and melodious singing in the house fits persons for singing elsewhere, especially if persons are taught to sing correctly, gently and tenderly, even without instrumental accompaniment. Then the hymns learned by the young linger in memory, a heritage against days of darkness and sorrow.

THE GREATEST

I HOLD him great who, for love's sake,
Can give with generous, earnest, will;
Yet he who takes, for love's sweet sake,
I think I hold more generous still.

I bow before the noble mind
That freely some great wrong forgives;
Yet nobler is the one forgiven
Who bears the burden well, and lives.

Great may be he who can command,
And rule with just and tender sway;
Yet is diviner wisdom taught
Better by him who can obey.

Blessed are they who die for God,
And earn the martyr's crown of light;
Yet he who lives for God may be
A greater conqueror in his sight.

CHEERFUL NATURES.

OUR disposition is much of our own making," writes Dr. Talmage. "We admit there is great difference in natural constitutions. Some persons are born cross. See that man with a long face that never shortens into a laugh! Tell me, did not his mother have trouble with him when he was small? Why, he never was pleased. Did he not make riots in the nursery among looking-glasses and glass pitchers? Was his nurse ever able on her knee to jolt down his petulance, or shake up his good-humor? Did he not often hold an indignation meeting flat on the floor — his hands, his head and his feet all participating in the exercises? Could not his father tell you a story of twelve o'clock at night, with hasty toilet, walking the floor with the dear little blessing in his arms? A story that would be a caution to old bachelors.

"Some are from infancy light and happy — they romp, they fly. You can hear their swift feet in the hall. Their loud laughter rings through the house, or in the woods bursts into a score of echoes. At night you can hardly hush their glad hearts for slumber, and in the morning they wake you with [illegible]. Alas! if then they leave you, and you no more hear their swift feet in the hall, and their loud laughter ringing through the house, or in the woods bursting into a score of echoes; if they wake you no more in the morning with their sweet song, if the color go out of the rose and its leaves fall; if angels for once grow jealous, and want what you cannot spare; if packed away in the trunk or drawer there be silent garments that once fluttered with youthful life, and by mistake you call some other child by the name of the one departed—ah, me! ah, me! Go to where the wild flowers stand drinking out of the mountain-brook, and, scattered on the grass, look as if all the oreads had cast their crowns at the foot of the steep. Hark to the fluting of the winds and the psalm of the thunder! Look at the morning coming down the mountains, and evening drawing aside the curtain from heaven's wall, of jasper, amethyst, sardonyx, and chalcedony! Look at all this, and then be happy."

CHAPTER XVI.

A SON DISOWNED

AT the close of a sultry day in the midsummer of 1790—as near as I can guess—the little forest community around Ballygran, was stirred by a strong religious impulse; an impulse the large and lasting results of which, only the day of God can declare. It began thus: there rode into the Heck settlement, a man of somewhat striking and notable appearance. He was about eight and twenty years of age. His figure was tall, well-knit, and his countenance more than commonly prepossessing. One arm, however, was quite paralyzed, and shrivelled to such a degree as to intimate that the paralysis was of long-standing. He was much bronzed by exposure to wind and weather; a fearless horseman evidently, boldly riding at a gallop through root-entangled paths, and leaping venturesomely across the streams and pools made formidable by the recent rains.

The stranger wore a coarse felt hat with a brim of uncustomary breadth; his coat was of homespun, snuff-colored cloth, with a somewhat clerical fashion, owing to its straight upright collar and its cutaway skirts. A stout pair of high leather leggings showed that he was equipped for long and difficult travel across all sorts of by-ways, and his inevitable saddle-bags and the coarse frieze overcoat rolled up in front of him emphasized the fact. He presented a typical and striking picture of the Methodist traveling preacher, as he was to be found in the wilds of Canada a hundred years ago. Riding up to the house of honest Paul Heck, without dismounting, he knocked with the handle of his riding-whip on one of the posts of the "stoop."

Paul himself answered the stranger's summons; and, according to the admirable and unsophisticated customs of the time, greeted the traveler with a kindly welcome, holding his bridle and inviting him to dismount.

"Thank you, kindly," said the stranger; "but will you first answer me a question; for if that receive a 'No,' I am afraid I must ride on and make my request at some other door, I am on the King's business, and—"

"You're a Methodist preacher!" interrupted Paul with a smile on his face that answered the intended question before it was put.

"That's it exactly," said the young horseman, with a little laugh, his parted lips revealing a set of beautifully white teeth, while his eyes kindled with a glow of satisfaction. "Can I preach here to-morrow, think you?"

"To-morrow's 'the day which the Lord hath made,'" said Paul, rubbing his hands in high glee. "We will rejoice and be glad in it: and all the more that you are come to join us. Fain and glad will we be to have you. Turn in and tarry with us. Here's both lodging and provender and such—"

"God speed the coming and delay 'the parting guest,'" said Brave Barbara, who had come to see and hear. "Come in thou blessed of the Lord," and, straightway, the first properly-appointed Methodist preacher who had ever found his way into these Canadian wildernesses, Losee, by name, was ushered into the house, Barbara declaring, as she led the way, that he was more welcome to her hearthstone than tongue could tell.

"Will you ask your husband not to unsaddle my horse," said Losee. "For, with your good will, I must ask for preaching room, and go and tell what neighbors I can find within a few miles of this to come and hear the Word of the Lord."

"Nay, marry," said happy Barbara, laying her hand upon the preacher's arm, for he had lingered a little, ever anxious about his Master's business. "Your portion for this night is to come within and rest, and if needs be sharpen your weapons to do valiantly for the L[illegible]. [illegible] y[illegible]. Our [illegible], and my good man, Paul, will call the neighbors, and find joy and gladness in the doing of it."

As she led the preacher into the spacious living-room, and ensconced him in the corner of the big settle by the hearth, Barbara's joy seemed to know no bounds. "Thank God that I live to see this day!" she went on. "We are Methodists here, and we have pined and hungered for the preaching of the good Word of grace even as the hungry long for food."

"'Bless the Lord, O my soul,'" said the preacher, lifting up his hands in exaltation. "The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places. I knew not that there was a Methodist in Canada, and here almost as soon as I enter the country, I find the servants of the Lord who will help my work."

"Ay, that will we," said Barbara, readily. "Both my husband and my boys can tell the news of Jesus, and our neighbors, Philip Embury and John Lawrence—"

"Embury? Philip Embury?" said Losee, starting to his feet. "Do you mean that worthy servant of the Lord who, with the aid of Mistress Heck and some others, began the good work in the old sail-loft of New York? I thought that he was dead."

"The saint of God you speak of is dead," said Brave Barbara, her face glowing under the influence of awakened memories, or rather, he lives now a higher life in the Paradise of God, but his son dwells here and walks in his dear father's footsteps, and will stand shoulder to shoulder with you in the battles of the Lord. Good Philip Embury's widow lives here, too; happily married to a Methodist local preacher, who is strong to carry the banner of Immanuel. As for the Mistress Heck you speak of, she accounts it to be one of the honors and privileges of her wandering life to give loving welcome to a Methodist preacher and to offer him the best in her house and home, as she does now."

Here our heroine stretched her hand in renewed welcome to her guest. William Losee bounded to his feet again, returned the grip she offered him with strong feeling, and, speaking with quite impressive reverence and respect, he said:

"Then am I still more blessed and favored for this goodly heritage of Christian communion, privilege and peace. Let me say to you, having but lately come from New York and the Methodist Society there, 'O woman, great was thy faith!' The Church grows and grows by leaps and bounds. The seed which you and your comrades planted hath already become a great tree, and of all the names held in honor by our brethren there none stand so high as those of Philip Embury and Barbara Heck!"

Then was the face of Brave Barbara suffused with blushes. She was not greatly given to the "melting mood," but in this case her head was bended beneath the burden of thought that crowded on her; her eyes filled and overflowed with the rush of feeling; her whole soul was filled with joy as she thought of the growing, spreading, ever expanding tree she had helped to plant in the soil of the new world.

While the preacher was doing ample justice to the generous meal set before him, and enjoying the welcome rest after a hard day's toil—he had ridden more than thirty cross-country miles that day—Paul Heck and his eldest son Jabez were away among the more distant neighbors, announcing the coming services for the Lord's Day. The next day the spacious living-room and the adjoining kitchen were filled and more than filled with willing listeners. A chair had been placed in the doorway that connected the two rooms, a table, too, to support the Bible and hymn-book, and William Losee stood there to proclaim the Word of the Lord.

The preacher then took for his text, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." Even while he spoke, the strange and subtle power, which was one of the strange characteristics of the earliest Methodist preachers, laid hold upon the assembled foresters, and upon none with more abiding effect than on the young man, Reginald Pemberton, whose soul was moved to tears. In the afternoon of that great day, the large barn was resorted to to hold the growing crowd, and in the evening, for the young evangelist did not spare himself, the crowd had to adjourn into the open air.

Early on the following day, the wandering evangelist was again on his way pioneering through all the region round about, and in places still more distant. We hear of him at the settlements of the Bay of Quinte and at Niagara, where he found another Methodist nucleus consisting, strange to say, of some members of the Schweitzer family, whose "forbears" had hailed from the green valley of Ballygran. In this way it was that the great Dominion of Canada was first illumined with the light of Life as lifted by Methodist hands and fanned into fullest brightness by the impelling influence of a high-toned Christian life.

There was much difference of sentiment in the little community on the St. Lawrence River as to the services of that never-to-be-forgotten day. The Methodists were greatly refreshed in spirit, and Brave Barbara called it specially "a day of the Son of Man and of power." Josiah Whiteside wisely refrained from extended criticism. He contented himself with a shake of the head, and the remark that God was not in the earthquake nor in the thunder, but in the still, small voice. The still and soft-voiced Hannah shrank within herself as from something which jarred painfully on her sensitive spirit; but, with her usual evenly-balanced temper and judgment, she replied to her husband that God was both in the earthquake and the thunder, but that these were not what Elijah needed to bring him to the feet of God.

Colonel Pemberton, who had been induced for friendship's sake to attend the afternoon service mainly to please his neighbors the Hecks, and who emphatically did not approve of what he saw and heard, was by no means restrained in his expressions of hostile opinion.

"A frothy babbler, that's what the fellow is," he said, with high indignation; "a putter forth of strange doctrines in an outlandish and illiterate way, a way which is as far from any harmony with the Book of Common Prayer and the authorized and established Church of England as the poles are asunder. To say that is to condemn the whole business."

This was gently said, as compared with his utterances when it came to his knowledge how "Redgie," as he called his favorite son, had been handled. Reginald was the old man's hope and pride; and when he discovered what had occurred, the militant squire simply lost his temper out-and-out.

"Just think of it," said he to his good lady who could not even speak in the presence of his tornado of indignation. "Here's a ranting Methodist fanatic who brings his intolerable, superstitious witchcraft to bear on my Reginald, and to make him weep and sob and cry for what he calls 'pardon,' side by side with ne'er-do-weels!"

Mrs. Pemberton, whose soul was glad within her at the thought that "Redgie" had chosen the better part, had just then no answer for her irate husband. She might have reminded him that "my Reginald," as he called him, was hers, too; and have persuaded him on that ground to modify his condemnation. But that was the stately Colonel's habit. It was "a way he had." "My" was one of his strong points. He was quick to conclude his diatribes against Methodists, and against poor Losee in particular, by threats of vengeance, peremptory and condign.

On the other hand, Mammy Dinah and Aunty Chloe were in ecstacies of delight.

"Dis is de ole kin' o' 'ligion, like dat we use to hab in ole Virginny," said Aunt Chloe.

"On'y dat dis 'ere is jus' a leetle mo' so," replied Mammy Dinah with that original streak of philosophy and quaint force of expression which marks the negro mind. "Anyhow, de preacha' done talkee good, and there was a powa'ful heap o' meanin' in it."

Uncle Pompey shook his patriarchal locks with much dubiety.

"If it had a-been a good Baptis' brudder dat was a-holdin' fort," the old man said, "I 'spose I might ha' foun' mo' suga' in de cane myse'f; but dese Mefodis' folk, what am dey be?" with which mysterious conundrum we must pass the fine old fellow by. "What am dey be?" the Methodists soon answered for themselves.

"Well, Mike, my boy," said our friend John Lawrence, who had proved a staunch and most efficient Lieutenant to the preacher, and who, to put it in his own way, had had grapes from Eshcol and honey in the comb. "And what did you think of Mr. Losee and of yesterday's doings?"

"Why, shure an' I can say somethin' consarnin' that same; but, faith, to tell you what I think, that's beyant me, an' no less. There's some things so sweetly good that they won't bear the tellin', and so much av it that they'll scarcely bear the howldin' av 'em an' be the same token yesterday's blissed peep into paradise was wan av 'em. Glory be to God!"

Such were some of the varieties of opinion of the proceedings that marked the advent of the first Methodist preacher into New Ballygran.

On a subsequent day, a painful scene took place between Colonel Pemberton and his son, Reginald, as the result of the great awakening to which I have referred. Redgie had become a regular and zealous attendant at the Methodist preachings, for I need not say, that Methodist like, William Losee held fast the footing he had gained, and made the River Settlements a fixed and constant appointment in his wide and toilsome "circuit round." Overcoming his natural reserve, Reginald had thrown himself with strange energy and great acceptance into Christian work; taking part in public prayer, boldly relating his new experience as a disciple of Jesus, and exhorting earnestly at Inquiry Meetings, which came to be held night after night in the house of Brave Barbara. One Monday morning after the young man had been engaged in a day's campaign as a soldier of the Cross, the Colonel called him into his own private room.

"Do you mean to set your father's will and authority at defiance?" said the Colonel in a towering rage. "You might as well know it now as later—I will not suffer these absurdities to continue."

"Father," said the young man, speaking firmly and slowly, but evidently under strong feeling, "I owe you all filial obedience, and it is my joy as well as my duty to render it, but where my duty to my God and Saviour is clear, I dare not disobey him."

"And who is to be the judge of your duty, on any subject, I should like to know, unless it is your father?"

"We must each give an account of our own selves unto God," said Redgie, solemnly, "and I cannot violate my conscience even for the best of fathers, and that you have been to me all my life."

"Why this is flat rebellion!" exclaimed the imperious colonel, quite ignoring a plea which his own calmer judgment would have been constrained to admit.

"Nay, father, not rebellion; I love you too well to be guilty of that; not rebellion, but true loyalty to the Higher Authority that you yourself acknowledge."

The old military chief was troubled by truths that he could not question; and so he found resource and shelter in an outburst of petulance and wrath: "Well, all I have to say is this," he shouted, "if you will join those brainless fanatics, you are no longer son of mine. I disown and discard you, as I would a hundred sons if they did the like."

"Oh, don't say that, father," said the youth with real agony of soul in tone and feature.

"I have said it," thundered the imposing old autocrat; "and I mean it, too. Your home shall no more be beneath this roof."

A brief silence ensued. The father looked in magisterial severity on his boy; the son stood with bowed head and tearful face. The pause was intense.

"Well, what is your choice?" said the colonel, with a gesture of impatience.

"My choice is made," said Reginald, his face pallid, and his hands clasped in nervous strain. "I have joined the Methodists, and I will not forsake them. I love the Methodist daughter of two saints of God, and if I may, her life and mine will flow together. Don't tempt me, father, don't! It would be betraying my Master to turn back from following him and—" he continued, as his tender love for Gracie came upon him, "it would break my heart."

"Very well, sir!" said the colonel, now fairly beside himself in presence of this outrage on all authority. "As you have made your bed, so you must lie on it—and shall, sir, for all I care. Go; and let me see your face no more!" so saying, the old gentleman pointed to the door, and turned angrily away.

"Oh, father, dear father!" pleaded Reginald, now almost beside himself with distress. "Don't spurn me from your presence. Never son can be more loyal and more loving than I will be—never—"

"Go, sir, go!" said the passionate parent.

"At least let me see my mother before I go," pleaded the youth.

"No, sir!" said his testy sire, in a voice of thunder. "You are breaking her heart with your selfish ingratitude"—which was not true—"and turning your mother's love to gall"—which was equally false. "It will give her needless grief to look upon you."

Here the father snatched away his hand which Reginald had taken, and strode angrily from the room.

Reginald threw himself upon the floor in an agony of grief. The room seemed to whirl around him. He felt sunk in the darkest midnight of despair. The strongest of earthly ties were snapped assunder. It seemed to his strongly affectionate soul, as if the solid earth was rocking beneath his feet.

Our Neglected Children.

the church, and both are now prospering. There are many cases like that of Baring.

In a recent letter, Mr. Sharp says: "Passing though the village of Prairie Hill, lately, I heard of the triumphant death of a young married woman, who had been converted before her marriage at a meeting which I conducted in a place where I organized a Sunday School, some miles from Prairie Hill. During her protracted illness, she was a bright illustration of the power of divine grace to sustain and comfort in hours of sorrow and pain. Knowing that her pilgrimage was rapidly nearing its close, her faith, patience and resignation never forsook her. The end was peace. The occasion of my visit to Prairie Hill was the anniversary of their Sunday School which I had organized. The previous history of Sunday School effort in that vicinity, as given me on my recent visit by an officer of the school is, that a denominational school had been attempted not far off in one direction, and another denomination had tried to conduct a school in another direction. Neither had much prosperity. A meeting of great power had been held by an evangelist, and I was sent for to organize a school. The people decided it should be a Union School. It has prospered and I attended their anniversary exercises the 21st of May, by their invitation. The large church was packed with old and young. The exercises and the song service were delightful, and harmony and good feeling prevailed among the people. Thus one prosperous Union School seems to be far better than two struggling, sickly ones in a small village.

YOUNG INDIAN PUPILS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD MISSIONARY'S SCHOOLS.

"I see fruit also from family visitation. In an adjoining county, one of the tracts I distributed ('Immediate Salvation for the Chief of Sinners'), was the means of bringing joy to an invalid. It was a woman who lay suffering with a fatal disease. She was in great distress about her eternal welfare. The tract was sent to her and it was the means of so great a blessing that she said, after it had been read, 'Now my way is clear; I am ready to go.' She continued in this happy assurance of a home in heaven till she fell asleep. She feared no evil, for God was with her."

One phase of our missionary's experience is graphically detailed below:

"As I go from house to house and learn the spiritual condition of the parents and children, I feel like saying as did the Saviour, 'Truly the harvest is great, and the laborers few.' Hundreds of families have not got a Bible or Testament in the house, and take no religious papers of any kind. One Saturday evening as I was going to an appointment, I was driving through a mountainous district and I saw a little cottage off to my left. I turned in, drove up to the door, and there stood three lovely little girls, and, on knocking, a lady opened the door. I told her I wanted to leave her children some papers to read. She seemed delighted, and as I passed the papers to the children the mother said, 'We will have a Sabbath to-morrow, won't we darlings?' She went on to say that they had no Christian privileges, and the Sabbaths were so long with nothing to read. She said she was not accustomed to living in that way.

"I learned afterwards that her husband was an infidel, and when I drove through the locality again, I made it a point to call and see them. I found the lady sick. I left some papers and cards for the children, and when I bade the husband good-bye, I asked him if he loved the Saviour. He hesitated for a short time, then answered 'Yes.' I saw his sister a few weeks after, and she said he had told her all about my visit, and the question I asked him, and that he made up his mind there and then to throw up his infidelity, and try to live a Christian life. I found one locality where the leading spirits were infidels. They would not allow the Bible read in the schools. I went around and told them I wanted to organize a Sunday School. They said 'No.' They were doing very wrong, I said, to keep their children from light and knowledge. I asked them if I could have the use of the house the next evening, and after considering the matter, they let me in. I asked them to come out, and we had a houseful and organized a good Sunday School.

"At another point, I canvassed a town; got no encouragement to speak of. They told me there was not a Christian in the place, and that dances, card-parties and lyceums, were the 'order of the day.' I called a meeting, and it stormed so that we could not do anything. I called another, had a good houseful, and organized a large school. I was visiting two Sunday Schools on a recent Sabbath near the latter place, and there learned that it was 'just flourishing' and was the best in that part of the county."

Another letter (this from Texas), gives still a different glimpse of the experience of a Sunday School missionary. "The first school I organized this month," he writes, "although close to a railroad village where there is always one and sometimes two Sunday Schools in operation, is a very much needed institution. A number of the settlers have lately arrived, and while making homes here, will be in very reduced circumstances for a year or two. I found that only six or eight among the fifty or more young people in the neighborhood, had ever attended the town schools, and so I gathered them together and organized an afternoon Sunday School. The people there preferred a Union Sabbath School and a teacher in one of the denominational schools in town, was elected superintendent. The members then threw in of their scanty means; I added a donation, and the work was begun.

"Some of the neighborhoods in this section are of a very primitive style. Old fashioned log houses, ox-wagons, old-time singing schools, using the four-note system, and lots of hard shells, not progressive at all, but honest as the day is long. What would I not give if I could transport one of these old-style singing schools into your presence and then watch the effect! I stopped one night in a double log house with a drive-way between, down in the forks of two rivers. I and the boys occupied one room, the old folks and the girls the other. Sunday morning dawned cold and the folks were drowsy, for we had been up late the night before. After awhile the old man began to call "Joe, git up! Git up, Bill! Git out and feed!" But none of the boys budged. Joe wanted Bill to roll out first, and Bill wanted Joe. Finally the door opened and in came the old man with a long razor-strop in his hand. He collared one of the boys, and in less time than it would take to tell it, the cows were getting their feed."

Our missionary's work during the year just closing has been so signally blessed in many ways that we feel no hesitation in commending to our readers his support for another year. This class of Christian service lies comparatively near at hand, and is the quickest in its returns. Let us send the Gospel of Jesus to those neglected children in the distant States; let us bring them together in sweet assembly, and teach them the songs of salvation. We should esteem it one of the highest privileges to have these young lives expand spiritually under our care and patronage. A sacrifice made for the sake of such a glorious work is indeed a blessed sacrifice!

Contributions for the support of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Sunday School Missionary for another year will be duly acknowledged in these columns.

NATIVE EVANGELISTS IN ASSAM.

AN interesting work by native preachers among the Garos of Assam, is described in a letter to the Missionary Review by Rev. E. G. Phillips. It appears that the Garos are demon worshippers and offer annual sacrifices. They readily comprehend the doctrine of the Atonement. The first two of the Garo tribe were converted thirty years ago. They began work among their people, and four years later forty converts were baptized and a missionary located among them. Since then the growth has been steady, until now there are about 2,300 communicants, and there have been probably 4,000 baptisms on profession of personal faith. The work is moving on with increasing momentum, and promises in the near future to bring in the whole tribe. More than 700 were baptized during the past year. The great part of the churches are self-supporting in the matter of finances, church discipline, and to an encouraging degree in aggressive church work. The standard of church life is maintained at a higher point than in many parts of Christian lands.

TRUTH'S LONGING.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

LORD make me thine, by grace divine,
And keep me, by thy power,
My faltering, footsteps safely guard
Till Life's last closing hour.

Oh let thy light fall full and clear;
Bright on my pathway shine;
Be with me Saviour, ever near,
And cheer this heart of mine.

Chase all the shades of gloom away,
With Faith's majestic beams,
And lead where Truth's effulgent ray,
From Glory's hilltop streams.

Thyself reveal to me, my God,
With hope my soul inspire
Melt thou my cold and frozen heart,
With Love's celestial fire.

By Mercy's sweet, inspiring strain
Close draw me, to thy side,
Possession take and there remain,
And in my heart abide!

And as I know, and love, and praise,
And walk within thy light,
I will, my King, thy standard bear
And serve thee with my might.

Saved Her Sight

"My little girl Hazel two years ago had the grip, leaving her with inflamed eyes, so bad that for seven months we had to bandage them and keep her in a dark room. The family physician and an oculist said the sight of one eye was destroyed and she might lose the other. She suffered intense pain, and when light was admitted to the room would cry as if burned with a hot iron. We began giving her Hood's Sarsaparilla, and to our surprise her eyes began to improve rapidly. The sight gradually returned and she is now as well as ever. Her eyes are permanently and perfectly cured." W. A. BUTTERFIELD, 1495 Hasting St., Detroit, Mich.

GOD'S LAUGHTER.*

All the self-will in the world does not alter the fact that the authority of Christ is sovereign over human wills. We cannot get away from it; but we can either lovingly embrace it, and then it is our life, or we can set ourselves against it, like an obstinate ox planting its feet and standing stock-still, and then the goad is driven deep and draws blood.

The metaphor of bands and cords is taken from the fastenings of the yoke on a draught bullock. One can scarcely miss the sharp contrast of this truculent exhortation to rebellion with the gracious summons, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me." The "bands" are already on our necks in a very real sense, for we are all under Christ's authority, and opposition is rebellion, not the effort to prevent a yoke being imposed, but to shake off one already laid on. But yet the consent of our own wills is called for, and thereby we take the yoke, which is a stay rather than a fetter, and bear the burden which bears up these who bear it.

Psalm 1 sets side by side in sharp contrast the godly and the godless. Here a still more striking transition is made in the second strophe which changes the scene to heaven. The lower half of the picture is all eager motion and strained effort; the upper is full of Divine calm. Hot with hatred, flushed with defiant self-confidence and busy with plots, the rebels hurry together like swarming ants on their hillock. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." That representation of the seated God contrasts grandly with the stir on earth. The thought embodied is like that expressed in the Egyptian statues of gods carved out of the side of a mountain, "moulded in colossal calm," with their mighty hands laid in their laps and their wide-opened eyes gazing down on the little ways of the men creeping about their feet.

And what shall we say of that daring and awful image of the laughter of God? The attribution of such action to him is so bold that all danger of misunderstanding it is impossible. It sends us at once to look for its translation, which probably lies in the thought of essential ludicrousness of opposition, which is discerned in heaven to be so utterly groundless and hopeless as to be absurd. "When he came nigh and beheld the city, he wept over it." The two pictures are not incapable of being reconciled. The Christ who wept over sinners is the fullest revelation of the heart of God, and the laughter of the psalm is consistent with the tears of Jesus as he stood on Olivet, and looked across the glen to the Temple glittering in the morning sun.

God's laughter passes into the utterance of his wrath at the time determined by him. The silence is broken by his voice, and the motionless form flashes into action. One movement is enough to "vex" the enemies and fling them into panic, as a flock of birds put to flight by the lifting of an arm. There is a point, known to God alone, when he perceives that the fitness of time has come, and the opposition must be ended. By long-drawn out, gentle patience he has sought to win to obedience (though that side of his dealings is not presented in this psalm), but the moment arrives when in world-wide catastrophes or crushing blows on individuals sleeping retribution wakes at the right moment, determined by considerations appreciable by us: "Then does he speak in his wrath."

A CHURCH OF THE PEOPLE.

JOCELYN crossed the street, went up the little wooden steps, and entered at the low swinging door. It was a very small and humble temple in which she found herself: lamps, by whose dim glare she descried the foul-worn and weather-beaten faces of the scattered congregation, mill-hands, she conjectured they were mostly; rough-looking, down-faced men; homely women, with tired, and some with anxious, or saddened eyes; here and there a girl, young as herself, from whose cheeks the roses had not yet faded, nor the laughter out of their looks, and showing their youth by a bit of cheap "artificials" in their bonnets, or a gaudy ring upon their coarse, ungloved hands. But all were decent in their appearance, devout in their behavior; and singing the dear old words of her mother's hymn to her mother's tune, as earnestly and reverently, though with many an extraneous quack and quaver, as she could have done herself.

They took no special notice of her entrance; one after another new-comer kept dropping in from time to time; they were standing as they were singing, and singing with all their hearts; and Jocelyn quietly slipped into an unoccupied pew, and lifted up her voice and her heart in unison with them. The minister stood up before them upon a low platform of unpainted pine: a young man, one of "the people," like themselves, but with an earnest face, and a singularly sincere and sympathetic voice. After the hymn was ended, which he led in a full deep baritone voice, he spoke a few words of exhortation, counsel, comfort; just what Jocelyn thought must go straight to the hearts of such listeners as these before him, and which stirred her own with strange unexpected power. Afterward he prayed; and he seemed to divine all the most real and secret wants and troubles, hopes and fears, and sorrows, aye, and joys of those humble, but very human souls, and bear them to the feet of God as though they were his own. That they voiced the inmost cry of the heart was shown by the frequent low amens that sounded out here and there among the kneeling assembly, and Jocelyn felt awed.

She did not need the dusty little hymn book which lay on the bench beside her; every line of the tender, impassioned strain was familiar to her, and she sang it through with a fervor of feeling, a sense of her own share in that "Life," that "Light," that "Peace," which had not visited her tired and discouraged soul for many days.

YOUNG FRIENDSHIPS.*

Do not be in a hurry in the formation of friendship. Keep the man at arm's length till you know something of him. Acquaintanceship is one thing; intimacy is another.

You may be courteous without being confidential, and civil without being effusive. Do not suffer yourself to be unwittingly bracketed with an idler or a fool. Think twice or three times before you accept a friendship that is obtruded, almost forced upon you.

> The man who boasts you Tom or Jack,
> And proves by thumping on your back
> How social he can be,
> Is such a friend, that one had need
> Be very much his friend indeed
> To pardon, or to bear it.

So long as it is in their humor or to their advantage, they will be hand and glove with you, but when they find you can do them no more service, you are dropped at once. There is nothing more galling to a sensitive nature than to be suddenly deserted by one on whose constancy you had been led to rely.

Remember, your own character will be judged by the kind of persons you associate with. Be it a prince or a day-laborer, a man's favorite company is a pretty sure index of his own moral standard. Pythagoras, before he would admit any one into his school, made strict inquiry as to who his intimate associates had been; rightly judging that those who had been careless about their companionships were not the most likely to derive benefit from his instructions. A very brief acquaintanceship has been known to do a life-long injury. The chemist will tell you that a single grain of iodine is sufficient to give color to a hundred gallons of water; and a week of unwholesome friendship may prove enough to poison your whole life.

AN ORPHAN'S WORK FOR CHRIST.

A REMARKABLE mission work has been carried on in the city of Dunedin, New Zealand, which has been started by Rev. W. Ready. He was the tenth child of an Irishman, who lived in London. When six years old he became an orphan, and was cast upon the streets of the city. He followed the 'buses, tumbled for coppers, picked up scraps of food, slept under arches and in ash-boxes. For six years he never slept in a bed. At the age of thirteen he did not know a letter. A city missionary sent him to Mr. Muller's Orphanage in Bristol. A year later he was apprenticed to a Mr. Perryman, of Chagford, where he was converted, became a local preacher, went to Shebbear College, and finally entered the ministry.

After doing good work for a short time in England, Mr. Ready went to New Zealand, did well in and around Christchurch, and then proceeded to Dunedin. He hardly knew a person in the place. At eight o'clock one Sunday evening he stood in the Octagon, his wife being by his side, and sang, "Oh, where is my wandering boy to-night?" People were attracted. He said, "On the other side I saw a bill announcing that an infidel would lecture on 'Is the Bible True?' He will attempt to show you from books that the Bible is not true: I will prove from history, observation, and experience that the Bible is true." And on he went. Some time after a burly charwoman, half drunk, made an attack upon him. He turned aside, saying, "Gough tells us that a man who runs away from a woman is a hero, and I mean to be one." This was a splendid advertisement. Rattray Street Hall, seating 350 people, was gradually filled, then crowded Last August the Lyceum was secured. It was built in 1882 for the propagation of free thought, but the promoters came to grief. The hall will seat 1,000 people, and is in the centre of the city. It is filled every Sunday night. At least half the congregation previously attended no place of worship. Many remarkable conversions have taken place.

THE HIDDEN MOTTO ON THE RING

YEARS ago, a lad returning home from school, picked up a gold ring. The owner could never be found, and the lad said to his mother, as he committed the ring to her care, that if ever he were married he should like to have it for his wife's wedding ring. Years passed by, and, in a little village church, his youthful wish was fulfilled. But the ring had a special miesion to accomplish. Looking carefully at the ring soon after finding it, the lad discovered that it had engraven on the inside the motto: "God's providence, mine inheritance." The lad pondered over the words and thought to himself, how great was the blessing they described. "Yes," he said to himself, "that shall be the motto of my life: 'God's providence, mine inheritance;' that means God's love, God's care, will be my estate, my riches. I shall be rich and happy indeed, if all my life through I have God to love me and provide for me." In this way he received the message of the ring; and the motto taken for life was marvelously fulfilled. On his tombstone is cut a representation of the ring, with the motto upon it. Beneath his name was inscribed the last text which he was ever able to read: "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory" (Psa. 73: 24.)

RICH FOR A MOMENT.

THE ship Britannia, which struck on the rocks off the coast of Brazil, had on board a large lot of Spanish dollars. In the hope of saving some of them a number of barrels were brought on deck, but the vessel was sinking so fast that the only hope for life was in taking at once to the boats. The last boat was about to push off, when a midshipman rushed back to see if any one was still on board. To his surprise, there sat a man on deck with a hatchet in his hand, with which he had broken open several of the casks, the contents of which he was now heaping up about him.

"What are you doing?" shouted he. "Escape for you life! Don't you know the ship is fast going to pieces?"

"The ship may," said the man: "I have lived a poor wretch all my life, and I am determined to die rich."

His remonstrances were answered only by another flourish of the hatchet, and he was left to his fate. In a few minutes the ship was engulfed in the waves.

We count such a man a madman, but he has too many imitators. Many men seem determined to die rich at all hazards. Least of all risks do they count the chance of losing the soul in the struggle. And yet the only riches we can clasp to our bosom with joy in our dying hour are the riches of grace through faith in our only Saviour, Jesus Christ. Let us make these riches ours before the dark hour comes. They will continne and will afford joy and comfort when earthly riches are useless.

A LIVINGSTONE TABLET.

THE Royal Geographical Society of England, some four years since, appropriated a sum of money for a present to the chief Chitambo, who was so kind to Dr. Livingstone while living and who permitted the removal of his body after his death. They also prepared a bronze plate to be affixed to the tree by the side of which Livingstone died. Mr. Frank S. Arnot undertook to convey the present, but transferred his charge to Lieutenant Franqui, who has at last accomplished the trust. The bronze plate has this inscription: "Livingstone died here, Ilala, May 1, 1873."

AN EVANGELISTIC VACATION.

How Seven Young Medical Students from Dr. Dowkontt's College are Spending their Summer Holiday.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" GOSPEL STAGE ON ITS TRAVELS.

MANY young people have been considering during the past few weeks where and how they shall spend their vacation. Probably few, if any, are spending it just in the same way as are the young men whose portraits appear on this page. They have three months at their disposal, and they are devoting the time to an evangelistic tour of the middle States. The party consists of seven bright young men, all of whom are training for the work of medical missionaries in heathen lands. They are students in the college established by Dr. George D. Dowkontt in New York. When the medical schools closed early in June, the plan had already been matured and all arrangements made for a prompt departure. They propose to go as far West as their time will allow, holding religious meetings every evening, when practicable, and devoting Sunday exclusively to religious work. They will return to New York by a different route, and hope to be back in time to resume their medical studies in the fall. Perhaps this mode of spending a vacation may seem to many young men about the dullest and most fanatical that could have been conceived. The popular idea is to find some place where there is good fishing, or boating, or fashionable society, with concerts, balls, and other dissipations. Vacation is an "off time" when business, and studies and discipline of all kinds are suspended, that body and mind may recuperate for renewed effort. But when religion gets a firm grip of a man he is apt to be a little peculiar. He cannot take his pleasure just in the same way as other men take it. There is no law about these things; the religious man has a perfect right to amusement. The glory of Christianity is the freedom permitted to its professors. But spirit is mightier than law. The man who has imbibed the Spirit of Christ is likely to be a more devoted and self-sacrificing servant of his Master than any slave would be. Whatsoever he does, is done unto Christ and is done voluntarily and joyfully. It is a delightful service, in which hardships and privations are accepted cheerfully and only give an added zest to the occupation.

These young men have given proof before this of possessing that spirit. The selection of a career was of itself an evidence of the fact. Judging by worldly standards, they have decided to fling their lives away. For several years they have been working hard to get a thorough education. Now they are plodding away at the dry and nauseating details of medical science, in the endeavor to qualify themselves to heal disease, to relieve suffering and to restore the afflicted to health. It is hard and weary work, but many undergo it with the prospect of settling down to a lucrative practice in some city, where, after a few years, they will accumulate a fortune, or become celebrated throughout the land. But these young men have accepted the labor and put the reward away from them. They are preparing for work in some pestilential district of Africa, some hostile province of China, or some fever-infested valley in India. Neither wealth nor fame can be acquired by such methods. The best they can hope for, so far as they are concerned, is to escape with their lives from disease incidental to the climate, the club of the savage, or the attack of some wild beast. They must work hard as long as they live and must die poor and unknown. If a young man were condemned to such a life we should account it gross cruelty; but these young men have chosen it voluntarily. Christ gave himself, not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give his life for men, and these young men count it their highest honor to be followers of Christ. So far as in them lies, they have chosen to live his life and to endure hardships and privations that through their self-sacrifice other men may be helped and comforted. It is quite natural that they who have chosen such a life, should be giving their annual vacation to Christian work. They are not strange to such work. Dr. Dowkontt's students are not a leisure class. The doctor, himself is one of the busiest men in the city. When he has given his morning or afternoon lecture to the students and turned them over to the care of some other professor, he is promptly off downtown, where he finds every one of his dispensaries, crowded with patients, waiting for treatment and for the kindly word of Christian encouragement and advice that they never fail to get from him, and which often does them as much good as medicine. Before he is through at the dispensaries, some of the students have joined him, helping him in dispensing, giving Christian counsel to the waiting patients or helping in some other way. After the dispensary work is done, there are patients to visit in the tenement houses and in the wretched rooms up back alleys, and in rear courts where so many people live and get sick and die. Some of the students accompany the doctor on these visits and get practical experience in the healing art and in that blessed labor of cheering the sufferer and praying with the dying, of which Dr. Dowkontt does so much. That is the way these students spend their time in the city while they are preparing for more arduous work in heathen lands. Poor Summers who perished in Africa, Dr. W. J. Hall, who is now laboring amid innumerable dangers in Corea, and Dr. Heli Chatelain who is just back from the fatal west coast of Africa, and many others gained their knowledge of medicine and Christian experience in the same way, by Dr. Dowkontt's side in the New York slums, where they saw much suffering and no fees.

SEVEN STUDENT EVANGELISTS, NOW TOURING IN THE MIDDLE STATES.

These seven are all poor men. The leader of the party is the eldest son of Dr. Dowkontt and is poor as a matter of course. The Doctor sees too many people who are in need of necessaries and has too kind a heart to often have money at command for his own family. Another of the party is Mr. A. F. Chapman who, until he came to New York to study, was an evangelist in Manitoba. A third is Mr. John E. Henderson, who comes of a missionary stock, his father being engaged in Christian labor in Jamaica, West Indies. His elder brother too is to be a medical missionary and will be a successful one, if we may judge from the fact that at the recent examinations in the University of New York, where he is studying, he ranked fourth in a class of two hundred. He expects to go to China this fall, while his younger brother, who is one of our party will go to Africa when his studies are finished. Both the brothers go under the auspices of the Baptist Society. A fourth member of the group bears the honored name of Charles Finney Tambling. He has already had a University education and is a senior of Oberlin College. Mr. N. D. Cox is a Canadian. His father is a ship-builder at Kingsport. That he has the true grit needed for his work is evident from

ARROGANCE AND HUMILITY.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Luke 18: 13, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

NO mountain ever had a more brilliant coronet than Mount Moriah. The glories of the ancient temple blazed there. The mountain-top was not originally large enough to hold the temple, and so a wall six hundred feet high was erected, and the mountain was built out into that wall. It was at that point that Satan met Christ, and tried to persuade him to cast himself down the six hundred feet. The nine gates of the temple flashed the light of silver and gold and Corinthian brass, which Corinthian brass was mere precious stones melted and mixed and crystalized. The temple itself was not so very large a structure, but the courts and the adjuncts of the architecture made it half a mile in circumference.

We stand and look off upon that wondrous structure. What's the matter? What strange appearance in the temple? Is it fire? Why, it seems as if it were a mansion all kindled into flame. What's the matter? Why, it's the hour of morning sacrifice, and the smoke on the altar rises and bursts out of the crevices and out of the door, and wreathes the mountain-top with folds of smoke, through which glitter precious stones, gathered and burnished by royal munificence.

I see two men mounting the steps of the building; they go side by side; they are very unlike; no sympathy between them—the one the Pharisee, proud arrogant, pompous, he goes up the steps of the building; he seems by his manner to say, "Clear the track! Never before came up these steps such goodness and consecration."

Beside him was the publican, bowed down, seemingly, with a load on his heart. They reach the enclosure for worship in the midst of the temple; the Pharisee goes close up to the gate of the Holy of Holies; he feels he is worthy to stand there; he says, practically, "I am so holy I want to go into the Holy of Holies. O Lord, I am a very good man; I'm a remarkably good man; why, two days in the week I eat absolutely nothing. I'm so good; I'm very generous in my conduct toward the poor; I have no sympathy with the common rabble, especially have I none with this poor, miserable, commonplace, wretched publican, who happened to come up the stairs beside me."

The publican went clear to the other side of the enclosure, as far away from the gate of the Holy of Holies as he could get; for he felt unworthy to stand near the sacred place. And the Bible says he stood afar off. Standing on the opposite side of this enclosure he bows his head, and as Orientals when they have any trouble beat their breasts, so he begins to pound his breast, as he cries, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

Oh, was there ever a greater contrast? The incense that wafted that morning from the priest's censer was not so sweet as the publican's prayer floating into the opening heavens; while the prayer of the Pharisee died on his contemptuous lips, and rolled down into his arrogant heart. Worshipping there, they join each other, and go side by side down the steps, the Pharisee cross, wretched, acrid, saturnine; the publican, with his face shining with the very joys of heaven; for "I tell you that this man went down to his house justified rather than the other."

Now, I put this publican's prayer under analysis, and I discover in the first place that he was persuaded of his sinfulness. He was an honest man, he was a tax-gatherer, he was an officer of the government; the publicans were tax-gatherers, and Cicero says they were the adornment of the state. Of course they were somewhat unpopular, because people then did not like to pay their taxes any better than people now like to pay their taxes, and there were many who disliked them. Still, I suppose this publican, this tax-gatherer, was an honorable man; he had an office of trust; there were many hard things said about him; and yet, standing there in that enclosure of the temple, amid the demonstrations of God's holiness and power, he cries out from the very depths of his stricken soul, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" By what process shall I prove that I am a sinner? By what process shall I prove that you are a sinner? Shall I ask you to weigh your motives, to scan your actions, to estimate your behavior? I will do nothing of the kind; I will draw my argument rather from the plan of the work that God has achieved for your salvation.

You go down in a storm to the beach, and you see wreckers put on their rough jackets, and launch the life-boat, and then shoot the rockets to show that help is coming, out into the breakers, and you immediately cry, "A shipwreck!" And when I see the Lord Jesus Christ putting aside robe and crown, and launch out on the tossing sea of human suffering and satanic hate, going out into the thundering surge of death, I cry, "A shipwreck!"

I know that our souls are dreadfully lost, by the work that God has done to save them. Are you a sinner? Suppose you had a commercial agent in Charleston or San Francisco, or Chicago, and you were paying him promptly his salary, and you found out, after awhile, that notwithstanding he had drawn the salary, he had given nine-tenths of all the time to some other commercial establishment. Why, your indignation would know no bounds. And yet that is just the way we have treated the Lord.

He sent us out into this world to serve him. He has taken good care of us; he has clothed us, he has sheltered us, and he has surrounded us with ten thousand benefactions; and yet many of us have given nine-tenths of our lives to the service of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Why, my friend, the Bible is full of confession, and I do not find anybody is pardoned until he has confessed.

What did David say? "I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord." What did Isaiah say? "Woe is me, because I am a man of unclean lips." What did Ezra say? "Our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up into heaven." And among the millions before the throne of God to-night, not one got there until he confessed. The coast of eternal sorrow is strewn with the wreck of those who, not taking the warning, drove with the cargo of immortal hope into the white-tangled foam of the breakers.

The Pharisee and the Publican.

Repent! the voice celestial cries,
Nor longer dare delay;
The wretch that scorns the mandate dies,
And meets the fiery day.

But I analyze the publican's prayer a step further, and I find that he expected no relief except through God's mercy. Why did not he say, I am an honorable man; when I get ten dollars taxes I pay them right over to the government. I give full permission to anybody to audit my accounts; I appeal to thy justice, O God! He made no such plea. He threw himself flat on God's mercy.

Have you any idea that a man by breaking off the scales of the leprosy, can change the disease? Have you any idea that you can, by changing your life, change your heart, that you can purchase your way to heaven? Come, try it; come, bring all the bread you ever gave to the hungry, all the medicine you ever gave to the sick, all the kind words you have ever uttered, all the kind deeds that have ever distinguished you; add them all up into the tremendous aggregate of good words and works, and then you will see Paul sharpen his knife as he cuts that spirit of self-satisfaction, as he cries, "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified."

Well, say a thousand men in this audience, if I am not to get anything in the way of peace from God in good works, how am I to be saved? By mercy. Here I stand to tell the story: mercy, mercy, long-suffering mercy; sovereign mercy, infinite mercy, omnipotent mercy, everlasting mercy. Why, it seems in the Bible as if all language were exhausted, as if it were stretched until it broke, as if all expression were struck dead at the feet of prophet and apostle and evangelist, when it tries to describe God's mercy.

Oh, says some one, that is only adding to my crime, if I come and confess before God and seek his mercy. No, no! The murderer has come, and while he was washing the blood of his victim from his hands, looked into the face of God and cried for mercy, and his soul has been white in God's pardoning love! And the soul that has wandered off in the streets, and down to the very gates of hell, has come back to her father's house, throwing her arms around his neck, and been saved by the mercy that saved Mary Magdalen.

But, says some one, you are throwing open that door of mercy too wide. No, I will throw it open wider; I will take the responsibility of saying that if all this audience, instead of being gathered in a semicircle, were placed side by side, in one long line, they could all march right through that wide-open gate of mercy. "Whosoever," "whosoever." Oh, this mercy of God—there is no line long enough to fathom it; there is no ladder long enough to scale it; there is no arithmetic facile enough to calculate it; no angel's wing can fly across it.

Heavenly harpers, aided by choirs with feet like the sun, cannot compass that harmony of Mercy, Mercy. It sounds in the rumbling of the celestial gate; I hear it in the chiming of the celestial towers; I see it flashing in the uplifted and downcast coronets of the saved; I hear it in the thundering tread of the bannered hosts round about the throne; and then it comes from the harps, and crowns, and thrones, and processions, to sit down, unexpressed, on a throne overtopping all heaven—the throne of mercy.

How I was affected when some one told me in regard to that accident on Long Island Sound, when one poor woman came and got her hand on a raft, as she tried to save herself, but those who were on the raft thought there was no room for her, and one man came and most cruelly beat and bruised her hands until she fell off. Oh, I bless God that this life-boat of the Gospel has room enough for the sixteen hundred millions of the race—room for one, room for all, and yet there is room!

I push this analysis of the publican's prayer a step further, and find that he did not expect any mercy except by pleading for it. He did not fold his hands together, as some do, saying, "If I'm to be saved, I'll be saved; if I'm to be lost, I'll be lost, and there is nothing for me to do." He knew what was worth having was worth asking for; hence this earnest cry of the text, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

It was an earnest prayer, and it is characteristic of all Bible prayers that they were answered. The blind man: "Lord, that I may receive my sight;" the leper: "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean;" sinking Peter: "Lord, save me;" the publican: "God be merciful to me a sinner." But if you come up with the tip of your finger and tap at the gate of mercy, it will not open; you have got to have the earnestness of the warrior who, defeated and pursued, dismounts from his lathered steed, and with gauntletted fist pounds at the palace-gate. You have got to have the earnestness of the man who, at midnight in the fourth story has a sense of suffocation, with the house in flames, goes to the window and shouts to the firemen, "Help!" Oh, unforgiven soul! if you were in full earnest I might have to command silence in the auditory, for your prayers would drown the voice of the speaker, and we would have to pause in the great service. It is because you do not realize your sin before God that you are not this moment crying: Mercy, mercy, mercy.

This prayer of the publican was also an humble prayer. The Pharisee looked up, the publican looked down. You cannot be saved as a metaphysician, or as a rhetorician; you cannot be saved as a scholar; you cannot be saved as an artist; you cannot be saved as an official. If you are ever saved at all it will be as a sinner. "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Another characteristic of the prayer of the publican was, it had a ring of confidence. It was not a cry of despair. He knew he was going to get what he asked for; he wanted mercy, he asked for it, expecting it. And do you tell me, oh man! that God has provided this salvation, and is not going to let you have it?

If a man build a bridge across a river, will he not let people go over it? If a physician gives a prescription to a sick man, will he not let him take it? If an architect puts up a building, will he not let people in it? If God provides salvation, will he not let you have it? Oh, if there be a Pharisee here, a man who says, I am all right, my past life has been right, I don't want the pardon of the Gospel, for I have no sin to pardon, let me say that while that man is in that mood, there is no peace for him; there is no pardon, no salvation; and the probability is he will go down and spend eternity with the lost Pharisee of the text.

But if there be here one who says, I want to be better, I want to quit my sins, my life has been a very imperfect life; how many things have I said that I should not have said, how many things I have done I should not have done; I want to change my life; I want to begin now; let me say to such a soul, God is waiting, God is ready, and you are near the kingdom, or rather you have entered it, for no man says, I am determined to serve God, and surrender the sins of my life; here now, I consecrate myself to the Lord Jesus Christ who died to redeem me—no man from the depth of his soul says that, but he is already a Christian.

My uncle, the Rev. Samuel K. Talmage, of Augusta, Ga., was passing along the streets of Augusta one day, and he saw a man, a black man, step from the sidewalk out into the street, his hat off, and bow very lowly. My uncle was not a man who demanded obsequiousness, and he said, "What do you do that for?" "Oh," says the man, "Massa, the other night I was going along the street and I had a burden on my shoulder, and I was sick, and I was hungry, and I came to the door of your church, and you were preaching about 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' and I stood there at the door long enough to hear you say that if a man could utter that prayer from the depths of his soul God would pardon him, and finally take him to heaven. Then I put my burden on my shoulder, and I started home. I got to my home, and I sat down, and I said, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' but it got darker and darker, and then Massa, I got down on my knees, and I said, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' and the burden got heavier, and it got darker and darker; I knew not what to do. Then I got down on my face, and I cried, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' and away off I saw a light coming, and it came nearer and nearer and nearer, until all was bright in my heart, and I arose. I am happy now—the burden is all gone, and I said to myself, if ever I met you in the street I would get clear off the sidewalk, and I would bow down, and take my hat off before you. I feel that I owe more to you than to any other man. That is the reason I bow before you."

Oh, are there not many now who can utter this prayer, the prayer of the black man, the prayer of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner?" While I halt in the sermon, will you not all utter it? I do not say audibly, but utter it down in the depths of your souls' consciousness. Yes, the sigh goes all through the galleries, it goes all through the pews, it goes all through these aisles, sigh after sigh, God be merciful to me a sinner.

Have you all uttered it? No, there is one soul that has not uttered it: too proud to utter it, too hard to utter it. Oh, Holy Spirit, descend upon that one heart. Yes, he begins to breathe it now. No bowing of the head yet, no starting tear yet, but the prayer is beginning—it is born, God be merciful to me a sinner. Have all uttered it? Then I utter it myself, for no one in all the house needs to utter it more than my own soul: God be merciful to me a sinner.

NEVER HEARD OF GOD.

DEEPLY interesting reports of progress continue to come from Dr. D. McGilvary, who, as our readers will remember, has gone out under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board to labor among the Laos in the Indo-Chinese peninsula. It is practically a new field and a remarkable Providence seems to have been preparing the way for Christian effort. The latest news from the field comes in a letter from Dr. McGilvary to the Church at Home and Abroad, from which the following is an extract:

We have been out on our tour since January 3d, and have had daily cause for gratitude to God in our continued good health and fine openings for usefulness. We have visited the three churches of Pa Pow and Chieng Hai and Chieng Saân. Five adults have been received to the communion, and five children baptized. Beside this we have made several detours to the Musur and Kooie villages on the hills.

No trumpet tones that we can sound will give an adequate idea of this field. To be appreciated it must be seen as we see it. But even as we can represent it on paper, the Church must be blind and deaf if it does not see opportunity and hear the call of Providence that it cannot ignore and be guiltless. The opening up of the Northern Laos tribes under English rule is the complement of our Laos Mission work, adding vastly to its importance while numerous hill tribes are thrown open under favorable circumstances hitherto unknown. They are not bound and trammeled like the great historic religions, by a literature hoary and venerable from age, but are ignorantly worshipping the spirits or some spirit that nature or tradition teaches them must preside over the affairs of men, waiting for a religion that satisfies their wants and an alphabet by which it may be expressed.

I spent last night with a Kooie Phya, the highest rank of any of his tribe, who has a number of villages under him, who had never heard of Christianity till the news of Cha-Boo-Kaw's conversion reached him. It was most interesting to hear him expatiate to his villagers, who were all assembled, on the certainty that there must be a Creator of whose existence a year ago he had never heard. One of his first words after greeting me was "we sahaiken" (friends.) In half an hour he had called up the fever patients to take quinine, entirely new to him, and had only my word that it was not poison.

Last week we visited a Musur village containing some twenty-five families. One of our elders had gone on before and announced that the Krews (teachers) had come and when we reached the edge of the village we found the whole village out to receive us, men, women and children. We remained only three days and nights, but I believe we left them all believers with only one obstacle to their making a public profession of their faith. They have been so long under the rule and espionage of their Shan rulers that they can hardly believe that they can take an independent stand without liability to punishment. But they have begun to feel the influence of the changed surroundings. I think it will not be long before they will be able to overcome this last obstacle and openly confess their faith in Christ. The quinine distributed last year has convinced them more than our arguments that it is safe to renounce their spirits who were dreaded as the cause of all their diseases the most common and fatal being malarial fever. We ask an interest in the continued prayers of the whole Church.

INKSTAND AND SALVER OF RUSSIAN SILVER.

A Royal Souvenir from Prince Cantacuzene to the Proprietor of "The Christian Herald."

The Czar's Gratitude.

He Still Remembers what "The Christian Herald" Did During the Great Famine.

AMID all the troubles of state, the ruler of the Russias still retains a lively and grateful recollection of the kindness and sympathy shown by America towards his suffering people during the great famine of 1892. He remembered the cargoes of food sent to Riga and St. Petersburg by the citizens of Philadelphia and by the American Red Cross, nor did he forget the sending of the Leo which, freighted with the loving gifts and prayers of many thousands of CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers, reached the Russian Capital when the famine was at its height, and when the plague had begun to count its victims. At that time, as though to mark his special appreciation of the feeling of universal brotherhood and sympathy that had prompted the sending of the Leo, whose cargo represented every Christian denomination in America, he personally thanked the ambassadors who had come to oversee its distribution.

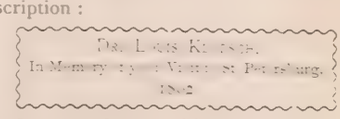
But the Czar resolved to give his American friends a more visible and enduring reminder than mere words. A few weeks go, he commissioned Prince Cantacuzene, the Russian Minister at Washington, to invite certain gentlemen to meet on board the Russian frigate, Dimitri Donskoi, at Philadelphia, and there, in the name of his imperial master, to present to each of the gentlemen invited a souvenir from the Czar himself. The recipients were the members of the Citizens' Committee of Philadelphia, Mr. Edgar of Minnesota (who succeeded in sending out the first cargo), Rev. Dr. Talmage and Dr. Louis Klopsch, the editor and the proprietor of this journal. The testimonials, in every instance, consisted of pieces of Oriental inlaid work in silver. That presented to Dr. Klopsch (shown in the illustration), is a mammoth inkstand of solid Russian silver, on a salver of the same material, and is pronounced by expert jewelers and silversmiths as probably the finest and most perfect specimen of enamelled work ever brought to this country. On a plate outside the case is the inscription:



In accordance with the Emperor's wishes, these beautiful and costly souvenirs of a memorable year were presented "on Russian soil"—the deck of the imperial warship being so considered. Prince Cantacuzene, in distributing the gifts, made appropriate remarks, expressing anew the Czar's high appreciation of the great kindness shown by America the "good Samaritan" of the nations, to the hungry millions of Central Russia.

PAUL AT ATHENS.

S.S. Lesson for July 16 Acts 17: 22-31. Golden Text, John 4 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ON leaving Philippi, Paul and Silas, accompanied by Timothy, passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, first staying in the city of Thessalonica because there was a synagogue of the Jews. It needed only three Sabbath days' preaching to found the Church at Thessalonica, while they occupied the week days chiefly in working for their living, that they might not burden any of those to whom they brought the message of salvation. Paul did not at first see all the fruit of these three days of ministry. His testimony was that it behooved the Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead, and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ. It was and it did its work so truly that God could afford to let persecution break out without detriment to this new-born Church. "Some of them (the Jews) believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout Greeks a great multitude." They had not so much prestige to lose as the Jews had; they sought the truth for its own sake, and besides these, "of the chief women not a few" became disciples of Jesus of Nazareth. Barely a year passed by when Paul could speak of these converts in the highest terms. (1. Thes. 1: 2-10.) This was the Church which learned so readily to turn to God from its idols "to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven;" it was these whose work of faith and labors of love, and patience of hope, made him give thanks to God always for them, because, as he himself says, "our Gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.

A God-sent Message,

Oh, how we learn that it is not the length of time an evangelist stays in a place or the number of meetings which he holds, that determines the amount of fruit which he shall gather. The quick outbreaks of persecution which followed only is in itself evidence that God saw in this healthy infant church that which would stand trial. Persecution arose, as usual, from the Jews, who, to gain their ends, did not forbear to join to their cause the rowdies of the city, to mob the house of Jason (the host of the Church) with the thought of executing lynch law upon the servants of God. Not finding them, they arrested Jason with the indictment that he had received into his house "these that have turned the world upside down." What a commentary on the Word: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." (1. John 5: 4.) Something more than man must lie in the power which, through three days' preaching in a Jewish synagogue—not so much as in a heathen temple—should yet turn the world upside down! But so real was the change which God had wrought in these Thessalonian believers that, instead of grieving over their wrongs, they "received the Word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost, so that they "were ensamples to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia," (1. Thes. 1: 6, 7), and, far from being discouraged, they published the blessed news of salvation around them so as to make it unnecessary for Paul and his companions "to speak anything." Oh how wondrous is the power of the truth spoken by yielded instruments!

From thence the three missionaries went to Berea, where many were awakened, search the Scriptures daily. Here also persecution followed, but the brethren sent away Paul, keeping Silas and Timothy for a while. Thus Paul came alone to Athens. This was another land, it was the æsthetic city of the day. Poetry, art, music, literature, flourished in Athens. Human nature there revelled in its own beauty and its own development. Nowhere were the fallen sons of man so fallen as in Athens, nowhere was the dignity of real truth, real unselfishness, real love so ignored as here; nowhere was the false gloss of intellect, imagination, art, and beauty so used to cover hideous sin as in the city of Athens: what a soil for the pride-humbling Gospel of Jesus! It was ordered of God that Paul should come on here alone in the first place, he must take in the situation from God's side, and must know the odds he had against him, and the strength and subtilty of this fortress of the enemy which he was to take in the name of the Lord. While waiting for his companions, he waited for the Lord, and new light upon his second coming broke upon him, so that from here he wrote his two Epistles to the Thessalonians. But, while thus communing with heaven, and writing by the dictation of the Holy Ghost,

His Spirit "Was Stirred

within him," in seeing the city was full of idols. Where was the boasted superiority of the Athenians if they were on the level of mere savages in their conceptions of God? He disputed in the synagogue with the Jews and the devout persons, and in the market, with "them that met with him." Jesus and the resurrection was his theme: it caused a stir, the people who could not answer him carried his arguments to the philosophers, who in their conceit thought that no one knew as much as themselves, said: "What will the babbler say?" Others: "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange 'demons.'" At last it went so far that he was invited to appear before the court of the Areopagus. It was a critical moment for Paul: it would seem as though his testimony for Christ must stand or fall as the result of this encounter with the august senators of Athens. Perhaps Paul was never more still in all his life. He knew well that man could not suffice for such a moment. But he knew also that the Master whom he served and who himself did not speak his own words, but only what he heard from the Father, would not fail him at such a moment. If he had attempted, by human wisdom, to overcome the human wisdom of those before whom he stood, the result would have been utter failure; but he knew how to trust his God, and he did not fail him but brought to his mind just the point where these men, who boasted of their knowledge, convicted themselves of their ignorance.

"Ye men of Athens, I perceive that ye are somewhat superstitious, for, as I passed by, and beheld your objects of worship, I found also an altar with this inscription

To the Unknown God."

What therefore ye worship in ignorance, that set I forth to you. (R.V.) It was intensely personal, intensely practical, any really hungry souls would eagerly drink in his message, and, if the remainder mocked, it was only what the Jews had done before. At any rate, he had got their attention; God had made his way. Thank God, he may lead his children up to a walled Jericho, or up to the banks of a Red Sea, but he is responsible to make the breach in the walls, and the path in the waters.

Paul, having once obtained a hearing, makes assertions without proving them, he is A Witness, not a Disputer.

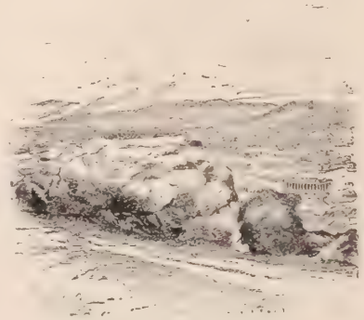
"God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things." Without another word Paul had reversed all their ideas of religion. Their gods were creatures of their own, made by them, or imagined by them, and bearing the stamp of their human origin. A God whose mighty hand had brought them into being, and who, as Master of the universe, needed nothing at their hands, but was himself the Giver of every breath they drew, and every moment of life which was vouchsafed to them, this was something so entirely new that, if it were true, must humble them to nothing, and overthrow almost the whole of their worship with which their art, and literature, and all they lived for was so inseparably connected.

Paul went on with his courageous assertions that God had created of one blood all nations of men for the very purpose that they should seek the Lord if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from everyone of us. And, on this ground, he argued the absurdity and the unworthiness of idolatry, that such a God, if he really was the object of their worship, should be likened to gold or silver or stone, graven by art and man's device. To an honest soul, his argument was unanswerable. If this unknown God were really what Paul represented him, then there was no excuse for learned inquirers like the Athenians remaining longer in ignorance of him. Their own poets testified against their ignorance of him. What could be more worthy of their attention than the knowledge of such a God! If anything were worth while, it was surely to know him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AFTER his release from prison at Philippi, Paul proceeded on his missionary journey. His sufferings there and elsewhere had no deterrent effect upon him. His duty was to preach and he went on performing it, indifferent as to the troubles it brought upon him. His first stopping place was Thessalonica, a city of of 100,000 inhabitants, about a hundred miles to the southwest. It is now called Salonica. To the church which he founded there, he subsequently wrote the two epistles preserved in the New Testament. Driven thence by a popular outbreak, he went to Berea, where he founded another church. Again persecution broke out, and Paul departed secretly, leaving Silas and Timothy to follow him. He traveled to Athens, the centre of culture of that day. The city was famous for art, poetry and philosophy. To Paul, however, as he walked about the city, the most impressive sight was the number of deities worshipped. Secular historians say there were no less than thirty thousand of these deities represented in Athens, so that it had become a proverb that it was easier to find a god than a man in the city. As his custom was, Paul appealed first to the Jews, talking with them in their synagogue and in the market-place. We can imagine how the Greek philosophers seeing a crowd gather to listen to a dispute about religion in the market, would stay and listen too. They evidently were impressed by Paul's words for they determined to give him a more attentive hearing. So they invited him to speak on the top of Mars' Hill, where the Council of Areopagus assembled. This was a court of the chief men of Athens having judicial powers, but on this occasion they appear to have met simply to hear Paul speak. It does not appear that he was there as a prisoner. His speech before this august audience is the subject of the lesson.



MARS' HILL AS IT NOW APPEARS.

The Unknown God. It is related that Zayd, a sage of Mecca, felt constrained to abandon the religion of his fathers. He perceived its absurdities and openly denounced the gods of the Khoreishites. But then he was without any religion and he was miserable. He determined to travel and consult learned men and pious men of foreign lands. But his family resisted him. He sighed under the constraint and went about bemoaning his fate. One day as he stood with his back against the wall of the Temple, he was heard crying out as if in physical agony: "Lord, if I only knew how thou wouldest be served, I would obey thy will, but I am in ignorance." He then prostrated himself on the ground and wept bitterly. The light for which he so earnestly longed, God has given to us.

Dwelleth not in temples. "You teach," said Trajan to Rabbi Joshua, "that your God is everywhere, I should like to see him." "God's presence is indeed everywhere but no eye can behold his glory." But the emperor insisted upon seeing the God of the Hebrews. "Well then," said Rabbi Joshua, "suppose we try to look first at one of his ambassadors." It was noonday and they went into the open air and the Rabbi bade the emperor look up at the sun in his splendor. "I cannot," said Trajan, "it dazzles me." "Thou canst not," said Joshua, "endure the light of one of God's creatures, and canst thou expect to behold the splendor of the Creator himself! Would not such effulgence annihilate thee?"

Of one blood all nations of men. This fact implies a universal brotherhood, but the tendency has always been to narrow and restrict it. The story is told of Dr. Skinner securing a contribution to foreign missions by a peculiar plea of neighborliness. It was from a man who said: "I do not believe in foreign missions, I give only to home missions. I want what I give to benefit my neighbors." Dr. Skinner asked, "Whom do you regard as your neighbors?" "Why those around me," was the reply. "Do you mean those whose land adjoins yours?" "Yes." "Well," said Dr. Skinner, "how much land do you own?" "About five hundred acres," was the reply. "How far down do you own it?" was the next question. "Well, Doctor," said the man, "I don't know that I ever thought, but I suppose I am entitled to half way through." "Exactly," said Dr. Skinner, "that is what I thought and I want this money for the Chinese, the men whose land adjoins yours at the bottom."

Though he is not far from every one. The thought is very solemn, as well as very precious. How many things we do, which we should not do if we remembered that God is not far from every one of us. A little girl found out how to enter an upper room of her father's house, where the apples were stored. She went again and again and helped herself to the forbidden fruit. She was not detected and there seemed no reason to fear. But one thing troubled her. There was a portrait in oils in the room and with the peculiarity of old portraits the eyes seemed to dwell upon her accusingly. They seemed to be saying to her, as she stooped down to take up the apples, "Ah, I see you! it is very naughty." This so annoyed the little culprit from time to time, that she was determined to put a stop to the threatening of those two staring eyes; so she procured a small knife, and cut them out. Ah! but there were still the two large holes in place of them, and she never could look at them without thinking of the eyes, and what they used to say to her. She had put out the eyes, but she had not, nor could she, get rid of her conscience. Moreover, the very means she had used for sinning without rebuke served to discover her guilt.

Ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold. Among the incidents of missionary labor is one of a youth, who, convinced of the folly of idol-worship, went to a certain temple and destroyed all the images except the largest. In the hands of this big image he put the stick with which he had broken the others. When the keeper of the temple discovered it he was furious, and exclaimed, "Who has done this?" "Perhaps," said the boy, "the big idol has been beating his little brothers." "Nonsense!" said the man; "it was you! and to pay you for your wickedness, I'll beat you to death with the same stick." And seizing the stick, he approached him. "But," said the boy, "how can you trust to a god so weak, that a boy's hand can destroy him? Do you suppose that if he cannot take care of himself or his companions, he can of you and the world, let alone making you?" The heathen stopped to think; for it was a new idea. Then he broke his great idol, and went and kneeled down to pray to the true God, and called him "My Father."

He will judge the world in righteousness. That is a fact of enormous import. The world is not accustomed to judgment of that kind. Wealthy wrongdoers hire skilful lawyers to plead for them and often succeed in escaping punishment. The innocent are sometimes condemned because they are misunderstood, and very often the courts with the sincere desire to do right are not sure which course is right. But at the judgment Paul spoke of there will be a Judge possessing all knowledge, all wisdom and all power, and he will judge the world in righteousness. Judge Gray, now of the United States Supreme Court was once holding court in Indiana when a man was brought before him who was clearly guilty, but he was very shrewd and had managed to keep within the letter of the law while doing a grievous wrong. "I wish I could punish you severely," said the judge, "but through a technicality of the law I must discharge you. But I know you are guilty and so do you. Do not congratulate yourself. You will one day come before a Judge infinitely greater and wiser than I and he will deal with you according to justice, which is higher than law."

ON BOARD THE "GLAD TIDINGS."

Captain Bundy's Good Ship that Carries the Gospel Flag along the Lakes—Seventeen Years of Voyaging, Preaching and Working.

Let your lower lights be burning
Shed a gleam across the wave,
Some poor fainting, struggling seaman
You may rescue—you may save.

THE strains of the familiar hymn have been heard many times during the past seventeen years, coming from the deck of a small vessel, as it rode at anchor in the harbors of Lake Huron or Lake Michigan. People have learned to look every summer for the coming of the Gospel ship Glad Tidings along these shores, for it has cruised there nearly a score of years. Captain Bundy, the skipper of the craft, now a grizzled veteran took a commission under the great Captain of Salvation twenty-four years ago, when he was converted on the barque Potomac of Chicago, and since then he has been an industrious navigator in gospel waters. His work, comparatively limited at first has grown with each succeeding year and his voyages have lengthened until they now include every available point on the great lakes where missionary effort of this character can be made effective. It is a work that brings out all the enthusiasm and best energies of those who engage in it, and the captain and his crew of Christian men, specially chosen for the work, have been greatly blessed in being the means whereby many souls were saved.

CAPT. HENRY BUNDY.

Captain Bundy has made many sea-trips in his lifetime, but none that he recalls with keener pleasure than one voyage he undertook on the barque Potomac of Chicago, about 1869. On that voyage his crew was converted almost to a man. A few had found the Saviour before they joined and the others were converted on board. Every day prayer-meetings were held in the barque's cabin, and all through the voyage there were evidences that the Lord was working among the men of the Potomac. At the close of the season the crew presented Captain Bundy with a large Bible, which all signed. It was shortly after this experience that Captain Bundy began his series of Gospel voyages, which have now continued uninterruptedly for nearly eighteen years.

The first evangelistic tour by water, he undertook in 1876, the total expenses for the season being less than $600. The seventeenth yearly voyage, undertaken in 1892, was completed at an expense of $3,500. His first Gospel ship was a comparatively small boat, which was soon discarded for a new boat built in 1883, and this again was set aside for the steamer, Glad Tidings, which was constructed in Chicago in 1889. The total annual expenses of the Mission for the current year will be about $4,000.

While in Gospel commission the Glad Tidings is one of the busiest vessels afloat. She never sails under sealed orders; her captain and crew always know their destination and what the Great Captain of the Fleet expects of every man on board. Usually starting from Chicago and skirting the western shore of Lake Michigan, the vessel touches at every available point where audiences can be attracted and services held. Thence, through the Straits of Mackinac, past Detroit and up to Lake Superior, first along the western shore and then returning along the northern and eastern shores and back to the point of departure. Occasionally the voyage is extended far beyond the boundaries indicated. At every stopping-point the Gospel ship casts anchor and the "good tidings of great joy" are proclaimed to the multitudes. All are invited to start on the voyage for Immanuel's land and at almost every harbor precious souls are brought out of the current of sin and landed in the haven of salvation. Here is a specimen of the invitations distributed by Captain Bundy's Gospel sailors:

"CHRIST DIED FOR THE UNGODLY."

Some of the voyages of the Glad Tidings deserve more than a passing mention. On entering a harbor, an effort is made to interest the sailors and longshoremen and at the noon hour and other convenient times meetings of considerable size are held with good results. People sometimes come from miles inland to the gospel ship. Preaching, plain, blunt gospel talks and good singing are powerful magnets to draw sailors. Bibles and good evangelical literature are distributed. The daytime services rarely last more than half an hour, but as a rule the evening services, owing to the large gatherings and intense interest, are usually larger. Sometimes the Gospel crew is encouraged to stay a week or more at one point, where the work has proved unusually effective. There are many places along the lakes—such as White Fish Point, Grand Maraias, Two Rivers, Snail Shell Harbor, Manistique, Point St. Ignace, Bay Mills and Port Arthur—where the sailors, bargemen and fishermen have evinced a deep interest in the work and many conversions have resulted. At some places, a considerable number of the population encountered are half-breeds, and they too have in many instances, been brought into the light. A good work has also been done among the Italian and French residents at different localities.

Work of this peculiar character is often attended with no little excitement and danger, but the captain and crew of the Glad Tidings like true Gospel mariners, lay their course by the divine chart, regardless of obstacles. Sometimes it happens that the crew is able to help a vessel in distress far out on the stormy waters of the lakes. Often in rough weather the Glad Tidings has bravely ridden out a gale with all her lines out; and thus far the little steamer has been providentially saved from disaster. There are many localities where her appearance is hailed with delight by hundreds of converts who have been made happy through the ministrations of Captain Bundy and his crew.

The Glad Tidings is now again on her annual voyage, as stanch and reliable and as well-manned as ever. A picture of the vessel and a portrait of her brave commander are given on this page.

SAVED IN THE SNOW.

A POOR girl who, after leading a life of wickedness in New York, was at last converted, gives this interesting account of her experience: "On the 6th of January last, I was wandering in the snow without either a home or habitation, and not knowing where to go, I went into the Florence Mission, I was spoken to by Mrs. Williamson, a kind Christian lady, who accompanied me to a Christian home in that dreadful weather, having first prayed with me and urged me to put my trust in Jesus. A more fearful night one can scarcely imagine, the wind and snow driving in every direction. I was indeed worn out and weak, having been living for several days on nothing but drink. For a long time I had associated with companions who were even worse than myself, perhaps, and more used to the curse of drink.

"I became each day more degraded; but now I cannot think of the snow without feeling thankful to God, for by the snow and through kind friends I have at last been brought to know Jesus, when I might have perished. The snow makes me think of the time, long past, when I was a young innocent girl, and God in his infinite mercy sent it to bring me back to him and once more make me white by washing my sins in the blood of Jesus. I am now one of his children."

TRAVELING IN AFRICA.

A MISSIONARY journey into the interior from Batanga is described by Dr. A. C. Good in a letter to the Church at Home and Abroad which gives a vivid idea of the difficulties of travel there. Dr. Good says: "Between the towns in the inhabited sections of the country the paths become thoroughly bad. No man in Africa ever does any work for the public good. No man ever removes an obstruction from a path unless for his own immediate convenience, and there is neither law nor public sentiment to deter a man from obstructing any road.

"When a man wishes to make a garden he does not make it beside the path, but across it, felling the trees just as they happen to go. The people who wish to pass by the road must clamber over the trunks and through the tangled branches as best they can. At one moment the native traveler is crawling on all fours under an obstruction, the next he is balancing himself on a trunk ten feet from the ground, but he never complains, and apparently it never occurs to him that there is any remedy for these evils. For carriers it is fearful work getting through these clearings. In the older settlements after the above obstructions have rotted away (they are never removed), a dense growth of weeds and grass often lines the narrow path on either side. This is always wet till 10 A. M. with dew, if not with rain, and the passer-by is of course soon wet to the hips."

the fact that he has turned the skill in the handling of tools, which he gained as a boy in his father's yard, to so good an account that he has defrayed his expenses through college by his own earnings. The sixth of the party is Mr. E. D. Vanderburgh of New York. He is the senior in point of medical attainment of the party. He has already passed through the New York Medical College. His destination, so far as his own choice can influence it, is Corea. The last of the group is Mr. B. O. Hester. He too, is a self-supporting student. He was for some time a trained nurse in the Brooklyn Hospital and from his earnings he saved sufficient to defray his college expenses.

Such is the group of young men who are now passing through Pennsylvania, on their way West. As we have said, they are all poor, but they are thoroughly in earnest and full of enthusiasm. When they came to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office early in the spring and spoke of their project, their enterprise and originality commended them to the heart of Dr. Klopsch, the Publisher. He at once placed his covered wagonette freely at their disposal and otherwise forwarded their project. They were thus able to reduce the expenses of their trip to a minimum, and some assistance in paying those, they hope to derive by securing subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is gratifying to learn that they are being cordially welcomed. At their first camp a friendly farmer opened his gates to them, permitting them to erect their tent on his lawn, giving them all the milk they needed, and housing their horses in his stables. They also report success with their meetings. In one place they had an audience of a thousand persons. They have named their vehicle THE CHRISTIAN HERALD GOSPEL STAGE and we are sure that that name alone will be a passport to the good will and kindly offices of thousands of persons who know and love the paper. For the sake of that name, and still more for the sake of the Master whom they serve, we bespeak for them wherever they may go, a cordial welcome.

THE MISSIONARY'S ENEMY.

A PATHETIC lament comes from Mr. Whiteside who is laboring at Bailundu, Africa. In writing to the American Board he says: "The other day hearing that the king had called his council together, I wanted to see what was going on, and I saw there about 200 men waiting anxiously the arrival of a trader. He soon came and with him a keg of whiskey. After filling a few bottles, which the king put aside, the rest was distributed to the crowd. It is sad to see how anxious the men are for the whiskey, and not only the men, but the boys as well.

"About a year ago when at the ombala [the king's village] as they were drinking whiskey, I noticed how one little fellow, not more than eight or nine years old, a bright little lad, managed to get as many as a half-dozen little drinks. I learned that he was the king's son, and by his head wife, and this is the reason that all were so ready to give him some of their whiskey. The effect on this little fellow is clearly seen. He has lost much of the brightness of his looks, and Mrs. Woodside says he is rather dull in school. Another of the king's sons, who has been coming to the ombala school and is remarkably bright, seemed rather stupid one day, and Mrs. Woodside asked him what was the matter with him, whether he was drunk, and he said he had been drinking whiskey, but that he would not do so again.

"A few times lately I have found Muenekalia, the man next to the king, at whose place we have our meetings, very much the worse for liquor. I have told him plainly of it afterward, when I found him sober. He admits it, says it is bad, and that he will not drink any more, which promise he faithfully keeps until he can get more, when he drinks as before. I think that whiskey-drinking will be a very great hindrance to our work at the ombala, and more and more so throughout the country, especially among the old men."

CHRISTIAN BROTHERHOOD.

THERE are a great many persons who pride themselves on their ancestry, and they glory over the royal blood that pours through their arteries. In their line there was a lord, or a duke, or a prime minister, or a king. But when the Lord, our Father, puts upon us the ring of his adoption, we become the children of the Ruler of all nations. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." It matters not how poor our garments may be in this world, or how scant our bread, or how mean the hut we live in, if we have that ring of Christ's adoption upon our hand, we are assured of eternal defenses.

Adopted! Why, then, we are brothers and sisters to all the good of earth and heaven. We have the family name, the family dress, the family keys, the family wardrobe. The Father looks after us, robes us, defends us, blesses us. We have royal blood in our veins, and there are crowns in our line. If we are his children, then princes and princesses. It is only a question of time when we get our coronet. Adopted! Then we have the family secrets. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Adopted! Then we have the family inheritance, and in the day when our Father shall divide the riches of heaven we shall take our share of the mansions and palaces and temples. Henceforth let us boast no more of an earthly ancestry. The insignia of eternal glory in our coat of arms. This ring of adoption puts upon us all honor and all privilege.

I have been told that when any of the members of any of the great secret societies of this country are in a distant city and are in any kind of trouble, and are set upon by enemies, they have only to give a certain signal and the members of that organization will flock around for defense. And when any man belongs to this great Christian brotherhood, if he gets in trouble, in trial, in persecution, in temptation, he has only to show this ring of Christ's adoption, and all the armed cohorts of heaven will come to his rescue.

OLD IDOLS.

THERE are a great many Christians in this day renewing the idolatry of human opinion. There was a time when they woke up to the folly of listening to what men said of them. They soliloquized in this way: "I have a God to worship, and I am responsible only to him. I must go straight on and do my whole duty, whether the world likes it or [illegible]" and they did it. But now they are [illegible] the fascinations of public applause. After a while they did something very popular. They had the popular ear and the popular heart. Men approved them, and poured gentle words of flattery into their ear, and before they realized it they went into the search for that which they had given up.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock one June night, Gibbon, the great historian, finished his history. Seated in a summer garden, he says that as he wrote the last line of that wonderful work, he felt great satisfaction. He closed the manuscript, walked out into the moonlight in the garden, and then, he said, he felt an indescribable melancholy come upon his soul at the thought that so soon he must leave all the fame that he would acquire by that manuscript.

The applause of this world is a very mean god to worship. It is a dragon that falls upon its worshipers and crushes them to death. Alas for those who, fascinated by human applause, give up the service of the Lord God and go as Laban did, to hunt in Rachel's tent for the lost images!

There are many Christians being sacrificed to appetite. There was a time when they said: "I will not surrender to evil appetites." For a while they seemed to break away from all allurements by which they were surrounded, but sometimes they felt that they were living upon a severe regimen. They said, "After all, I will go back to my old bondage;" and they fell away from the house of God, and fell away from respectability, and fell away for ever.

Oh, why go down hunting for our old idols? We have found out they are insufficient for the soul. Eyes have they, but they see not; ears have they, but they hear not; and hands have they, but they handle not. There is only one God to worship, and he sits in the heavens.

HOME SONGS IN HEAVEN.

THE very best singers sometimes get tired; the strongest throats sometimes get weary, and many who sang very sweetly, do not sing now; but I hope by the grace of God we will, after a while, go up and sing the praises of Christ where we will never be weary. You know there are some songs that are especially appropriate for the home circle; they stir the soul, they start the tears, they turn the heart in on itself and keep sounding after the tune has stopped, like some cathedral bell which long after the tap of the brazen tongue has ceased, keeps throbbing on the air. Well, it will be a home song in heaven, all the sweeter because those who sang with us in the domestic circle on earth shall join that great harmony.

It will be the children's song. The vast majority of the race die in infancy, and it is estimated that sixteen thousand millions of the little ones are standing before God. When they shall rise up about the throne to sing, the millions and the millions of the little ones—ah! that will be music. These played in the streets of Babylon and Thebes; these plucked lilies from the foot of Olivet while Christ was preaching about them; these waded in Siloam; these were victims of Herod's massacre; these were thrown to crocodiles or into the fire; these came up from Christian homes and these were foundlings of the city commons—children everywhere in all that land. Children in towers, children on the seas of glass, children on the battlements. Ah! if you do not like children, do not go there. They are in vast majority, and what a song when they lift it around about the throne!

The Christian singers and composers of all ages will be there to join in that song. Thomas Hastings will be there. Lowell Mason will be there. Beethoven and Mozart will be there. They who sounded the cymbals and the trumpets [illegible] will be there. The forty thousand harpers that stood at the ancient dedication will be there. The two hundred singers that assisted on that day will be there. Patriots who lived amid threshing floors, shepherds who watched amid Chaldean hills, prophets who walked with long beards and coarse apparel, pronouncing woe against ancient abominations, will meet the more recent martyrs who went up with leaping cohorts of fire; and some will sing of the Jesus of whom they prophesied, and others of the Jesus for whom they died. Oh, what a song!

Subscriber, New York City. What is the address of the daily prayer meeting, in Fulton Street, New York?

115 Fulton Street, New York.

Agnes McFarlane, Colfax, Ia. A great man had his guests arrested on a charge of theft. What was his name, and where is it found in the Bible?

Joseph. See Genesis 42 : 16, 17.

Bessie Clement, Bridgeport, Conn. Have you any statistics to show what woman has accomplished in business or the professions?

There are according to late estimates 3,500 postmistresses, 1,800 doctors, over 100 preachers, several hundred city missionaries, and a considerable number of artists, sculptors, editors, architects, bankers and a few lawyers in the United States. Many of the best known philanthropies are conducted by women, and the Patent Office has granted over 2,500 patents to the sex in the last eighty years.

Mrs. E. Warner, Carlisle, Ind. Is sanctification an instantaneous blessing or is it attained by continuous growth in grace? Can a person be fully sanctified before death?

It is a gradual process to which all the events of life should contribute. "All things work together for good to them who love God," because they are enabled to get good from all. The rate of progress may vary and there are seasons when sanctification advances more rapidly than at other times. In trial and suffering some Christians advance quickly. We do not know what you mean by fully sanctified. We think that neither before death, nor after, does the Christian ever reach a stage beyond which progress in grace and knowledge is impossible.

John E. Anderson, Boylston, Mass. Is there any ground for the statement that Mohammed claimed that he should be raised from the dead, and be caught up to the heavens in the sight of man, or was there any such claim made by his followers?

There is nothing in the Koran to sustain such a claim, although we believe some writers and commentators, in explaining the Koran, have so stated. Mohammed, according to Moslem belief, was carried to the seventh heaven soon after his death, and remains in uninterrupted conversation with Allah (God). Mohammed himself stated his belief that the soul and body of every man will be raised for judgment. All will share in this resurrection without distinction.

D. J. Horrell, Cochran, Ga. Was Maachah the mother or the grandmother of Asa? In 1. Kings 15: 2-10 there appears to be a contradiction

She appears to have been his grandmother. Her name is mentioned probably to show Asa's title to the throne. Rehoboam, his grandfather, enacted that of all his children only those of whom Maachah was the mother should be in line of succession to the throne (See 1. Chron 11: 22). She is spoken of loosely as his mother just as in the next verse to the one you quote (1. Kings 15: 11). David is described as his father, though he was really Asa's great-great-grandfather. Nor was Maachah the daughter of Absalom, but his granddaughter.

O. H., Denver, Colo. We are told by our Saviour that we must give an account of every "idle word" in the day of judgment. Please state What is understood by "idle words?" Does it include conversation about weather, dress, [illegible] telling of humorous stories etc?

Any conversation that tends to vanity and frivolity, or that merely serves to gratify the ear and please the passions, may be classed as "idle words." It is the duty of the Christian to set a watch upon his lips and avoid indulgence in the propensity to unprofitable conversation, a propensity which is unhappily fostered and encouraged by the present condition of society. At the same time, conversation that relates to the actual affairs of life, our surroundings, circumstances, business and relaxations are not necessarily "idle words" nor [illegible] telling of a humorous story necessarily so. The [illegible] mirth is a divinely-implanted part of our nature just as much as sorrow is. In no part of the Bible is cheerfulness forbidden or discouraged, while gloom on the part of a christian is clearly out-of-place in one who has the best reasons in the world for cheerfulness. Gloomy professors of Christianity have always done more to repel than attract others to the faith.

Miss E. E. Pohle, New York. Is it true, as I have heard it stated, that the closer we live to God the more trouble he will send us? Does not God bless those materially whom he blesses spiritually?

To your latter question we answer, it is certainly not his invariable rule to do so. There are many Christians who are greatly blessed spiritually who are not blessed in material things, unless you count poverty and suffering a blessing. Neither can your former question be answered with an unqualified affirmative. We think that God's treatment of his children is directed to their development. If he sees that trouble and suffering will lead to that end he will administer them; if prosperity will best promote development, he will send that. The same difference is made by judicious parents and teachers in the treatment of children. Some children develop better by kindness than by severity while others would make no progress if they were not treated severely.

Mrs. G. Boshart, Lowville, N. Y. If Christ is equal with God how was it that, as stated in Mark 13 : 32, the Father knew something of which the Son was ignorant?

It is reasonable to suppose that in the days of his flesh Christ experienced some curtailment of divine attributes. We read of his being weary, of his weeping, of his praying, being hungry and thirsty, and being tempted. We read also of his increasing in wisdom, (Luke 2 : 52.) We infer from all these that the divine nature did not have full scope for its powers in the human form. Christ seems to have been aware of his temporary inferiority to the Father while on the earth, for he said, "My Father is greater than I." (John 14 : 28.) We conclude, therefore, that a part of his humiliation was his voluntarily divesting himself of some part of his divine nature and this may account for his not knowing a fact which was known to the Father.

M. Meskimen, Oklahoma, Terr. Who wrote the Book of Proverbs?

Some ancient authorities, rabbins, and others attribute the book to Solomon; others hold that it has a composite origin and is the work of a number of writers. The ablest modern critics hold the latter opinion. It is probable that Solomon was the author of the portion beginning with the first verse of the tenth chapter and ending with the sixteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter. As we learn from the first verse of the twenty-fifth chapter, the collection of proverbs extending to the end of the twenty-ninth chapter was also attributed to him, but was not compiled until 250 years after his death. The remainder of the book appears to be composed of six portions by different hands at different periods. One of these is the introduction, which occupies the first nine chapters. This was probably written by the man who compiled the whole book, but whose name is unknown.

Ulysses G. Wallis, Webster, Ia. 1. What truth is taught in Matt. 9: 16-17? 2. Does not Rev. 9: 6 afford hope that the sinner will have opportunity to repent after death?

1. That the Jewish ceremonial law could not be combined with the free principles of Christianity. The remark was addressed to the men who came to Jesus to complain of his disciples neglecting the regular fasts. Christ's teaching throughout, was a liberating power freeing men from the bondage of the law and the letter. His illustration of the new wine in the old leather bottles was a warning of the impossibility of controlling and restricting the principles of growth and enlargement by the old Jewish rites and laws, of which he had previously spoken with contempt. The truth has not even to this day been fully grasped, as is seen by the divisions in the Church as to the forms of baptism, the Lord's Supper and other matters. Men still lay emphasis on the rite and act, rather than on the spirit. 2. The passage you quote refers to the Great Tribulation, not to the state of men after death.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE LOST BATTLESHIP.

THE deplorable calamity reported from the eastern shores of the Mediterranean has carried mourning into many a household. On June 22 the Victoria, one of the finest vessels of the English Navy was accidentally sunk, and two-thirds of her officers and crew were drowned. Not less than 430 lives were lost and among them was Sir George Tryon, the Admiral commanding the fleet. Only meagre details have arrived at the time of writing, but American naval officers say there is little doubt as to how the disaster occurred. The British squadron in the Mediterranean is generally composed of the best vessels of the fleet and was so at the time of the accident. The fleet was off the coast of Syria and was probably drawn up in a double line of ships, with the Victoria, the Admiral's flagship at the head of one line and the huge Camperdown at the head of the other line. The manœuvre being practised would be that known as the Isidrome or gridiron movement. It consists of each ship exchanging places with the one opposite to it, the ships in the right column passing to the left and those on the left passing to the right. The movement is an exceedingly difficult one, but it has been the pride of the captains to perform it expeditiously. On this occasion the Camperdown in crossing, struck the Victoria with her ram and stove a huge hole in her side. The order was immediately given to close the water-tight bulkheads, but while the crew were endeavoring to obey the order, the Victoria capsized and went down keel uppermost. Only the 255 men on deck were saved. It is supposed that as a bulkhead ran the whole length of the ship, one side would fill with water and cause a list, which would bring the heavy upper works of the vessel into such a position that she would turn completely over. The blow is the more severe because of the death of Admiral Tryon who was accounted one of the best naval officers England had. Milton says, "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war" and we see now that it has also its disasters. It is so in the Christian life. The spiritual wrecks are not most frequent in a time of stress and persecution, but in times of peace and prosperity and too often they are caused not by an enemy but by the heedlessness or unkindness of a brother. (Ps. 55: 12-14.)

An Ozone Lamp.

An interesting exhibition was made in Boston, Mass., a few days ago at the house of a scientific gentleman who has recently returned from a tour of Europe. He brought with him a curious lamp which he had purchased in Paris and which he says is much used there. He invited a party of friends to witness a test of its powers. The lamp is filled with alcohol and in the place of the ordinary cotton wick is a strip of platinum. The platinum is made red hot and is then covered with a wire gauze cage. The incandescence of the platinum continues until all the alcohol is exhausted. The effect on the room in which the lamp is placed is to purify the air. A room, the air of which is heavy with tobacco, or with noxious gases, either from sewer pipes or the presence of a crowd, becomes clear after the lamp has been used a few minutes. The exhibitor said that the inventor insisted that the lamp gave forth ozone which would overcome the foulness of the air in any place where ventilation could not be secured. It is thought that such lamps will be useful in the vitiated atmosphere of courts, theatres and crowded meeting-places. Its principle appears to be that of purifying the air, not by expelling bad properties, but by imparting good. It was such an influence Christ expected his people to exert in society, "Ye are the salt of the earth." (Matt. 5: 13.)

A Costly Fire.

Three orphan girls in St. Louis, Mo., have met with a sad loss which takes from them the only provision they had against sickness or misfortune. When their father died, about a year ago, he left them a sum of money which, after his funeral expenses had been paid out of it, amounted to about a thousand dollars. In addition they collected another thousand from his life insurance. They placed the whole in one of the banks as a provision for emergencies, and went out to earn their own living. A few weeks ago they were alarmed by the large number of bank failures, and feared that they might lose their money. They therefore drew it out of the bank, thinking it would be safer in their own keeping. As they were away from home all day, they debated as to the best place to keep it. They wanted a hiding-place where thieves could not find it in case of their house being robbed during their absence. Finally they decided to put the money, which was in greenbacks, at the back of the kitchen stove. This was done, but the youngest sister forgot the fact. Returning from her work the other evening earlier than her sisters, she set about preparing the evening meal. She lighted a fire in the stove forgetting to remove the greenbacks, and when the sisters came home and inquired about the money it was too late. All that was left of the greenbacks was a small heap of feathery ashes. They had better have left their money in the bank. Even if the bank had failed, they would not have lost all, as they have now done. Self-confidence and lack of faith are equally disastrous in spiritual matters. No greater calamity could come to the Christian than that of his taking his life into his own keeping as many would be glad to do. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." (Jer. 10: 23.)

A Fatal Railroad Disaster.

Eight persons were killed and about two score badly injured in an accident which occurred on the Manhattan Beach Railroad on Long Island on June 20. There is a tunnel 210 feet long on the road, which was formerly wide enough to admit two trains when the road was narrow guage. A short time ago it was made a wide gauge road and the tunnel was then wide enough for only one train. Instead of widening the tunnel, the company ran only one set of tracks through it and stationed a switchman near the entrance to prevent collisions. It was his duty to signal all approaching trains and if one train was in the tunnel and another came up and disregarded his signal, to open a switch which would turn the second train aside. At the time of the accident the tunnel was clear and the switchman signalled to go ahead. The engine and three cars proceeded into the tunnel, but when the fourth car reached the switch it was open. The couplings broke, and the car being so suddenly turned from its course fell over on its side and the cars following it were thrown across the tracks. The train was very heavily laden at the time and it is marvelous that the loss of life was not greater. The switchman has been arrested on suspicion of having opened the switch while the train was passing over it, but he contends that it must have opened automatically. It is a startling fact that the safety or loss of so many lives should depend on one man doing his duty at precisely the right moment. Every one perceives the gravity of the responsibility of a man in such a position; but few realize how much depends on their own performance of duty. Many a life has been wrecked which might have been saved, if some Christian had spoken the right word at the right time. (Ezek. 33: 6.)

In the Grip of a Quicksand.

A press dispatch from Harrisburg, Pa., states that a few days ago some boys spent a holiday in going bathing at Juniper Lake, near Cynwyd. One of them, who was fifteen years old, waded about on the thick mud at the edge of the lake. He stood still for a few minutes watching his companions. Presently he called to them to notice that the water was rising. It was to his knees then, although when he stopped wading to look at them, it covered only his ankles. The boys looked at him and one of them called out, "The water isn't rising, it is you who are going down." The boy became frightened and tried to wade out, but could not lift his feet out of the mud. He begged his companions to help him, but they could not release him. They ran to the village for help and on their way met a man on horseback, to whom they told their trouble. He went to the lake and tried to lift the boy out, but could not. The water by that time was up to his armpits and he was sinking deeper every moment. At that moment a man passed with a rope in his hand and then a new plan was tried. They made a noose at the end of the rope and the boy passed it beneath his arms. The man made the other end fast to his own body and remounting his horse started the animal away from the lake. The boy cried out with the agony of the strain, but declared that he was coming out and begged the man to continue. After several minutes hard tugging the boy was drawn out of the sand and lay exhausted on the bank. He would have gone to a dreadful death, but for the extraordinary measures adopted to rescue him. He could not have extricated himself, and his companions were powerless to save him. Like the sinner whose feet are entangled in vicious habits, he could be delivered only by a strength superior to his own. (Isa. 63: 1.)

Medicinal Water From a Battlefield.

Early morning travellers on the Elevated Railroad in New York have of late been surprised to notice the number of people who get off at the station on Ninth Avenue near Morningside Park. They carry cans or pitchers or glasses, and as they reach the street they join a stream of persons similarly equipped. A reporter joined the company one morning last week to ascertain their destination. He found that they went to a place on the ramparts, where a small lead pipe projected from the parapet. A stream of water trickled from the mouth of the pipe; and the people one by one filled their receptacles, some of them drinking it at once and others carrying it away. On inquiry he learned that the water is believed to possess medicinal qualities and it was said that several doctors in Harlem recommend it to their patients as a tonic. The reporter ascertained that the pipe was laid fifty years ago to drain a pond on the old de Peyster estate. A picture of the de Peyster mansion, in all its glory of two hundred years ago, shows the pond in the foreground. Its present possessor, however, wished to be rid of the pond, and finding that it was fed by a spring, ran a pipe to the Park to carry off the water and filled up the pond. It is a singular fact that the spring rises in the old battle-field of the Revolution. Washington used the de Peyster mansion as his headquarters and after he moved out, Cornwallis established himself there. Close to the spring is the stone wall where the fiercest part of the battle raged, and Colonel Knowlton and General Reid fell. The reporter humorously suggests that the life-giving properties of the spring are due to the fact that the surrounding soil has been enriched with the blood of the heroes of that historic struggle. The idea may be only a ghastly joke, but it suggests the truth very precious to the Christian's heart, that the water of life is placed within his reach through the shedding of his Saviour's blood. (1. John 5: 6.)

An Appeal to a Mother.

A pathetic letter appeared on June 23 in a New York journal. It came from a little boy about ten years old. The writer said that he had heard that the paper took an interest in little boys and he wanted its help. His mother had gone away and no one knew where she was. His father was almost crazy for "he loves mamma so much. Ever since brother Robbie died it has been so lonely." He could not tell his mother's name because his papa had told him it would be a disgrace to have it known that she had gone away. But if she only knew that they loved her and wanted her back she would come and they might all be happy again. "So," wrote the child, "will you please, Mr. Editor, say in your paper, 'Now mamma, for little Robbie's sake, who is dead, do come back.'" The editor published a photographic fac-simile of the child's letter in the hope that the mother might see it and be touched by the pitiful appeal. Her name was not disclosed but if she sees the letter she will understand that it is addressed to her. A still more pathetic appeal is addressed to every wanderer from God's fold. He is entreated to return for the sake of One who died to make that return possible. (II. Cor. 5: 20, 21.)

Drove Over Dynamite.

A serious disaster, which will probably have fatal results, occurred on June 12, near Fort Lee, N. J. A young man was driving a carry-all from the Fort to the New York ferry, and had reached a fork of the road just opposite the village, when a terrific explosion occurred. The vehicle was blown to pieces, the driver flung to the ground, and the horses thrown down. Two men on bicycles, who were some distance away, were overturned by the shock. A deep hole was torn in the solid rock of the roadway, and the houses of the village were shaken. The driver of the vehicle was carried to a neighboring house, and a doctor was sent for. He found that the man was injured so severely in the head and back that there is little hope of his surviving. In the roadway, two dynamite cartridges were found near the scene of the explosion. They were eight inches long, and about two inches in diameter. It is evident that there must have been a third cartridge, which the carriage wheel exploded. It is thought that some careless, or drunken, quarryman, working in the stone quarries in the neighborhood, must have dropped the dangerous explosives in the road, and left them there, heedless of the great harm they might do. Whether the man who did so can be held legally responsible for his act, if he is detected, is doubtful, although there can be no doubt as to his moral guilt. Those, however, whose wrongdoing or carelessness causes moral or spiritual injury to another, cannot escape punishment. Christ said it would be so severe that a man who was thrown into the sea with a millstone about his neck was in a better state. (Luke, 17: 1, 2.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Henry Varley is holding meetings at Falmouth, Eng., and Gipsy Smith at Manchester.

The North Dutch Church in New York celebrated the thirty-sixth anniversary of its missionary work on July 1. It is in this church that the Fulton St., prayer meeting has been held every day at noon since Sept. 23, 1857.

News comes from Persia that Mirza Ibrahim, a convert of the Presbyterian Mission in Tabriz, has been dragged from the mission, thrust into prison and offered the choice of recantation or death. He remained faithful to Christ, and on May 14 he was strangled.

Sunday rest is so urgently demanded in Belgium that a special postage stamp has been issued, inscribed "not to be delivered on Sunday," so that a letter mailed on Saturday evening will be kept until Monday, if it bears this stamp. This, it is expected, will relieve many letter-carriers of duty on Sunday mornings.

Rev. J. M. Crocker, Chaplain of the Penitentiary at Anamosa, Ia., desires us to thank our readers on his behalf for the copies of this journal sent him, in response to his request, for distribution among the prisoners. They were, he says, sent to him from every State in the Union, thus showing how wide is the influence of The Christian Herald. We hope that the circulation of the paper among the prisoners may be blessed of God.

Bishop Taylor has received the sad intelligence by cable from Africa that missionaries Walrath and Pixley are dead. They were attacked by fever at Vivi, and succumbed after a brief illness. Mrs. Walrath who has been the physician at the station was absent at the time in attendance on a sick missionary one hundred miles farther up the Congo. Mr. Pixley was an accomplished linguist and had spent several years in training here and in England for missionary work.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy will hold its seventeenth Summer School, July 6-12, in Prohibition Park, Staten Island. Among the speakers will be Prof. G. F. Wright of Oberlin College; Prof. Howard Osgood of Rochester; Prof. B. B. Warfield of Princeton; Dr. David J. Burrell and Dr. George Alexander of New York; Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Moody Institute, Chicago, and Henry George, the famous author of Progress and Poverty. Further information may be obtained by addressing Mr. C. M. Davis, 4 Winthrop Place, N. Y.

The Lutheran Church at Manheim, Pa., held a meeting on June 18th to pay the rental of the ground on which the church building stands. The annual rent consists of "one red rose" as covenanted in a deed dated 1772. Baron Henry Stiefel gave the land to the church on condition that one red rose should be given every year to his representatives forever. Mrs. Boyer of Harrisburg the great-granddaughter of the Baron, attended to receive "the rent."

The Turkish Government has condemned to death Professors Thoumain and Kayayon of the college at Marsovan, over which Dr. Herrick presides. Fifteen other Christian converts were also condemned to death and a large number to various terms of imprisonment. The charge against them was sedition and rioting and the burning of the Marsovan College. The English Government has protested against the sentences being carried out, and efforts are being made by Dr. Herrick to enlist the good offices of our government. The two professors are certainly innocent.

The project of founding a Protestant Evangelical journal in France has been introduced to the notice of the Christian public in New York. The McAll work sorely needs such an aid to defend it against the attacks of journals which are either infidel or Roman Catholic. Dr. Josiah Strong of the Evangelical Alliance cordially recommends the project, and it is expected that several wealthy Christian gentlemen will assist it with funds. Mr. Arthur H. G. de Rougemont of Paris, who has long been connected with the McAll Mission is now in New York making arrangements.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE IMPREGNABLE FORTRESS.

Sermon Preached last Sunday, July 2, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: 1. Peter 3: 15: "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear."

We are told that at the battle of Salamanca Wellington commanded one of his officers to advance with his troops and to occupy a breach which the Duke perceived in the lines of the French. The officer so commanded rode up to him and said, "My Lord, I will do the work, but first give me a grasp of that conquering right hand of yours." The grasp was given him and off he rode to the deadly attack. In our weakness a grip from Christ gives us indescribable strength. He is the fountain of all our life and power. The way to overcome human weakness is to receive divine strength. The best way, indeed the only way, to drive out darkness is to let in light; so the best way to avoid being terrified by the fear of men is to be sanctified by the fear of God. If we rightly fear God we shall never wrongly fear men. When the filial, fiducial, reverent fear of God is in the soul, weak and foolish fear of man can never control our thought and action. So we are commanded in the opening of this text to sanctify the Lord God in our hearts. The psalmist said, "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee." The three faithful men in a critical experience in reference to Nebuchadnezzar's command, said, "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter. Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning, fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But, if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy Gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up" Sanctifying God in the heart is the true and only antidote against all fear of men in daily life. We sanctify the Lord Jesus when we truly love and serve him; we sanctify him when our lives before men are according to his will. But it is not my intention to enlarge upon the thought with which this text opens important and benutiful though it is. That thought alone is worthy of an entire sermon. At this time I confine myself to the remaining clauses of the verse.

The Hope Defensible.

We are taught, in the first place, that every Christian has a good reason for his hope. A Christian's hope is always defensible. We repel with utmost scorn the idea that a man acts contrary to the highest reason when he submits to the lordship of Jesus Christ. Only as a man submits to this lordship does he act in harmony with the highest reason. The man who opposes Jesus Christ commits moral suicide. Faith is reason attaining its highest range and its loftiest reach. There are many things in religion above our reason; but they are not contrary to reason. They are above my reason and yours; but is our reason the measure of the highest reason? If there be a God, and he has given us a book which is a revelation of himself, we must expect that book to contain many things far above the reason of men. There must be obscure and mysterious elements in any complete revelation which the great God may make to finite men. Whenever and wherever the infinite comes into contact with the finite insoluble problems necessarily emerge. This result is due to the limitations of human attainments and possibilities. Many difficulties of thought and belief were experienced before Christianity was introduced, and are equally experienced now among thoughtful men where Christianity is unknown. These difficulties are due to our finite conditions and to our human limitations. The great thoughts of the Almighty cannot be crowded into our finite understanding. The spirituality of religious things makes it impossible for men, so largely under the influence of sensuous thoughts and material conditions, fully to understand lofty truths. Many of these truths are not reducible to human formulæ; they are vastly above our complete comprehension. We can apprehend God, but we cannot fully comprehend God. These great truths can be understood only as they enter into our natures and control our lives as a result of our personal experience of their reality. There are heavenly bodies with whose movements we are not entirely familiar. So far as our knowledge of the solar system is concerned, the movements of these bodies are above and beyond reason. Our laws do not fully explain their vast orbit, but there are doubtless laws of the heavenly bodies not yet fully discovered. The movements described are not contrary to law, although beyond all the laws with which we are familiar.

The Superior Laws.

None of the miracles of Christ were contrary to nature. In a certain sense, they were supernatural; but they never were and never ought to be represented as contrary to law. They were contrary to the laws with which we ordinarily are familiar; but they were in entire harmony with higher laws, some of which are beyond the range of our knowledge. When Christ turned the water into wine he simply accelerated processes which are constantly going forward. The same remark applies to the increase of the loaves, and to many other of his miracles. He often found many things in an abnormal state through the presence and power of sin; he simply by the exercise of divine power restored them to their normal state. By the interposition of a higher law he held the lower law in check for the time being. The higher law of preservation in salt holds in control the lower law of decay in meat. I hold this book in my hand and thus check the natural workings of the law of gravitation which would bring the book suddenly down to my pulpit. There is no contradiction here of the law of gravitation; there is simply the introduction, for the time being, of a higher law which holds the lower law in check. God nowhere is a violator of law. In the vast range of his universe he honors the laws which he himself has made. He constantly appeals to our reason in justification of his own claims upon us. Through his servant Isaiah, God commands us to reason together with himself; and through the apostle Paul he exhorts us to prove all things. Christianity asks no favors; it simply demands justice. No man ought to entertain opinions for which a good reason cannot be given. He may not be able to give the reason in all its fulness, but his inability so to do ought not to be taken as equivalent to the holding of reasonless beliefs. There are three kinds of evidence for and each is unanswerable within its own sphere; they are historical, internal and experimental. The strongest, however, in our practical work is the experimental. Of the significance of the word experience I spoke on a former occasion. Its derivation shows that it refers to truths which come out of us, or are held by us, because they have gone through us. We all understand that no man can testify to the power of certain remedies in medicine as can the man who has been thereby entirely cured of dangerous diseases. A man must be inside the circle of Christian influence in order to testify to its power. No man can appreciate the glory of a painted window, as seen by the sunlight, except he be within the cathedral into which the light comes through the pictured glass. The Christian faith is a glorious cathedral, and light from the face of God streams through its divinely pictured windows. He who stands without in daytime sees no splendor nor glory. Only he who is within discovers the matchless beauty and indescribable splendor of the heavenly light streaming through the glorious windows. Only he who does the will of God, as our Lord has taught us, can know whether the doctrine is of God. It is useless for men to discuss historic questions and oppose conclusions on supposed historic grounds if intelligent experience contradicts these imaginary conclusions. Mr. Beecher illustrated this thought by representing a number of historical students deliberating as to whether or not a certain harp was David's harp. One opposes this view, because the wood bears evidence of never having come down from olden times. He is sure that it is modern wood. Another is absolutely certain that the strings are of recent date. Still another is sure that it cannot be David's harp of solemn and harmonic sound because this one is so unmusical as not to deserve the name of a harp; but while they are discussing the matter a "gray bearded old harper comes in, and instead of answering their objections takes a stool, and sits up to the harp, and sweeping his hand from side to side over the strings, wakes its long-forgotten sounds, and rings out the ballad or the hymn; and then these men sit entranced. They labored to prove that the instrument was not capable of giving forth music; but they neglected to try it. And the moment the old harper laid his hand on it, it was its own argument, and it put to silence its defamers."

Testimony from Experience.

The argument from experience is that of the blind man who was healed by Christ. He could not meet the cavils of the captious Pharisees, but all the Pharisees in Jerusalem could not take from him the glorious experience that though he once was blind he now saw. The argument of many opposers of religion is absolutely worthless, because they have never had true religion. They are speaking of what, in the deepest sense, they know nothing. All the blind men in America could not make me believe that the sun is not bright, or that the rainbow is not beautiful. They are not competent witnesses. Experimental knowledge comes home with tremendous power. Only those who know it can appreciate its force. Only he who has tasted food can testify to its nourishment. The maniac who cut himself with stones and wandered in the tombs, but is now sitting, clothed and in his right mind at the feet of Jesus, is an unanswerable argument to the power of Jesus. Many in this audience, and many who will read these words on the printed page, can testify to the value of their experimental knowledge of Christ and his salvation. Your faith in God has supported you in the heaviest trials; it has soothed your keenest sorrows; it has allayed your fears and brightened your hopes. The evidence of a pure life is an irresistible argument for the truth of Christianity. In the year 1848 Lamartine introduced De la Eure to the riotous populace, saying: "Listen, citizens, it is a pure life of sixty years that is about to address you." That was a marvelous introduction. Sixty years of a pure life behind a sermon or oration make them mighty arguments and give them irresistible power. God give us this experimental knowledge of his Son Jesus Christ!

We remark, in the second place, that every Christian ought to be for his hope. He ought to be able to do it, and also, on all suitable occasions, to be willing to give this reason. Our position as members of the Church of Christ challenges inquiry. Men have the right to ask us questions regarding our faith. In our baptism, we by the very act, separated ourselves from the world. We sit to-day at this table of the Lord while others retire; and we ought to ask ourselves the reason for the difference between us and them. They doubtless will ask such questions. We ought not to regard questions of this sort, when asked in the right time and in the proper spirit, as impertinent intrusions; rather ought we to regard them as furnishing an opportunity for doing good to men and for giving honor to Christ. Doubtless there are times when an answer might be somewhat like casting pearls before swine; doubtless there are times when silence is golden. In matters of this sort, as in all other matters, we must exercise sanctified common sense. There is a time to speak and there is a time to be silent.

The word apology does not mean an excuse for our faith as if it were wrong. The word originally was used as a defence of what was right and true. Such an apology might include all three of the kinds of evidence of which I have spoken. Probably it was the experimental evidence which the inspired writer had especially in mind. Christians in our day must so advance in knowledge as to be able to defend the truth from attack. It is still true that the experimental evidence is the most powerful. This evidence, as suggested, the apostle Paul constantly introduced. He related his experience of the power of God's truth upon his own soul. Perhaps the church of to-day is in danger of neglecting this element of power. A statement of Christian experience was one of the greatest elements of power in the early days of Methodism; and scarcely less so among Baptists. Let us be sure that we have a well-founded hope of heaven; that we are

Resting on the Rock

Christ Jesus, and then let our answer be always ready in defence of our faith. We ought not to be obstrusive and indiscreet, but we ought to be always willing when the fitting time comes to speak the fitting word. If heaven's joys are in our souls, they will often be on our tongues. If we live with Jesus, men will take knowledge of that fact. If the love of Christ be in our souls it cannot long be hid. If the rose of Sharon be in our bosom it will fill the atmosphere in which we move with its fragrance. If we are Christ's, men will know the fact by the tones of our voice, the grasp of our hand, the glance of our eye, and the dominant spirit of our entire lives. Tell out this blessed experience. Tell it to everyone, rich and poor, learned or ignorant, to all of every nation. Tell how once you were without God and without hope; tell of Christ's wondrous love; tell of your joy in believing in him.

Every Christian, in the third place, ought to give his answer in a becoming spirit—"with meekness and fear." Much depends upon the spirit in which our answer is given. We may speak right words in a wrong way. We may tear down by our manner what we wish to build up by our matter. The manner is often more than the matter. Many a warm-hearted, earnest, loving Christian has done more to convince an opponent than the most learned, but harsh defender of Christianity could do. A loving heart makes an eloquent tongue. A Christian ought to lift up his head in any presence. He is a son of God, an heir of glory and a joint heir with Jesus Christ. He is the highest style of man.

True Meekness

is the climax of manliness. Christianity introduced a higher type of manliness than was ever before known. Often in classic Greek, words indicative of humility were allied to meanness. Christianity introduced new thoughts into the languages of the world. Some of these thoughts required new words for their proper expression; they sometimes burst the old words with their fulness of meaning. Virtue to the ancient Roman meant simply physical bravery; it lacked the noble moral quality now associated with the word. Christianity gave to the word meekness its exalted meaning and its sweet and gentle spirit. The modesty which religion inculcates is always an element of power. The man who cannot control himself cannot control his fellow men. Temperance, as used in Scripture, means self-control over the entire life. The man who loses his temper has lost power over men because he cannot exercise it over himself. It is implied in the text that Christians would sometimes be unduly assailed, that questions would often be asked in a taunting and insulting manner. Still they were to keep their temper; they were not to give way to feelings of resentment or revenge. Christian meekness is true manliness. It stands for that which is kingliest in man, queenliest in woman and Christliest in both. The Bible speaks of but with holy light, Christ, Moses, and Stephen; and they were men whose meekness was as marked as their faces were bright. Sir Walter Raleigh was once spat upon in public by a hot-headed youth who challenged him to mortal combat. Taking out his handkerchief the noble knight made this reply, "Young man, if I could as easily wipe your blood from my conscience as I can this injury from my face, I would this moment take your life." It is said that the misguided youth was so struck with his own misconduct and with Sir Walter's nobility that he fell upon his knees and sought forgiveness.

The meekness here endorsed is accompanied by fear—the fear which grows out of a reverent spirit, not a fear of those who propose a question. True fear drives out false fear. Let us have clear and definite views of Christian truth, and then let us deem it a high privilege to be witnesses for God. Bravely, joyously confess Christ before men. "The fear of man bringeth a snare." Spurn that fear as unworthy of a child of God. Shame came into the world because of sin, and shame ought never to be experienced except in connection with sin. Stand up in the presence of men and devils, and boldly give a reason for the hope that is within you. Let us be ashamed of cowardice and sin, but never of our faith, never of our Lord.

Ashamed of Jesus! that dear Friend
On whom my hopes of heaven depend!
No, when I blush, be this my shame,
That I no more revere his name.

A Chinaman Surprised.

A STRANGE incident which occurred in China recently, and is reported by Dr. Porter of Pang-Chuang, to the Missionary Herald, shows that the open public profession of Christianity, although it may bring persecution on the professor, may also bring him help and encouragement. This incident is that of a man silently fighting his battle in loneliness, while near at hand—unknown to him—were other Christians and a Christian church.

This man, by the name of Chang, some ten years ago went to Moukden, in Manchuria, for business. He was a good accountant and found a place where he stayed several years. His employer who was a Christian allowed him to go to the Sunday services and he was led to accept the truth and was baptized. He also studied a little, as opportunity offered. He thus had an intelligent knowledge of the Gospel. He was obliged to give up his business six years ago, and returned to his home some six miles from Chang Ssu Ma. He found a little school to teach and so did not get a chance to move about much. Partly owing to this and partly to a quiet disposition, he did not hear of any Christians about him and so felt much isolated. His family friends, on finding that he had adopted the foreign religion, were greatly enraged, especially his mother. He took home with him from Manchuria a large number of Christian books to the value of 60,000 cash [about $70.] This was a very large amount for a single individual to purchase. It was an indication of his interest in the truth. His mother at last got hold of his books and burnt them all. She became more and more hostile to him and would not let him live at home. The family were quite well-to-do, having a little jewelry business which kept the father away at Peking much of the year. The other members of the family treated him with respect, but his mother was very violent at times, and at last forced his wife and children to live at her own mother's house.

It seems that a niece in the family, on returning from a village north of them where she had been to consult an "eye doctor," reported what the doctor had said. The attention of Chang was aroused by what she reported, and he said, "The man must be a Christian; none but Christians talk in that way." So he went to see the eye doctor and found it was true, to his great delight, that there was a Christian near him. Chang then learned about the church at the village, and he has now identified himself with it and has had opportunity, which he much craved, for giving his testimony to the Gospel.

THE DRINK CURSE IN AFRICA.

MR. C. H. HARVEY, who has spent twelve years on the Congo in missionary work, writes in a recent number of Regions Beyond from Banza Manteka, of the awful havoc which strong drink is making among the natives of Africa. He says:

"My heart is much pained and my soul stirred by the present ravages of drink among the natives—of course I do not refer to the Christians. The sad thing about it all is that the drinking habits here are only the beginning of evil, and are bound to become, if not grappled with soon, a very abomination of desolation to these perpetually wronged people. I know that one weak voice cannot make itself heard sufficiently to effect any restraint upon this 'all-powerful interest.' Oh, that the Lord would make it speak! Still, if the Christians in England and America get to know the facts of the case and speak out about them, I do not fear the ultimate issue. European nations are more guilty to-day than they were half a century ago, for it has now been demonstrated that to introduce liquor among aboriginal tribes means nothing less than their perdition and extinction.

"I was especially struck during my recent journey down country, and during my stay at Matadi, with the awful strides that the drink traffic is making in this country. Wherever you go you see the natives engaged in the one pursuit of buying, selling, or drinking the 'malalu mamputu,' or trade gin. On my way down country my carriers could talk of nothing else but where to buy it, the price, etc., etc., and it was evident that their chief aim in getting cloth for carrying was that they might spend it in liquor. At the Luvu Bridge, where we stayed the first night, they succeeded in buying some gin, and not only they, but the six or seven other caravans camping there were almost to a man the worse for drink before they fell off to sleep; whilst good numbers were carousing far into the night."

Is it not time that the so-called Christian nations took action to stop the further spread of the African drink slavery?

QUESTIONS

THERE are solemn thoughts in my heart to-night,
And I dare not bid them go.
And many questions are asked of me
By spirits with voices low.

Am I walking nearer each day to Christ?
Am I waging war on sin? [lone
Am I telling poor souls that are heartsick and
That their Saviour will let them in?

Am I making this strange, sad world of ours
More bright by my presence here?
Am I fitting my soul, by forgetting self,
For life in a grander sphere?

The voices relentlessly ask these things,
And I ever must answer "No"—
They fill my heart with a deep remorse,
But I dare not bid them go.

Am I ever clinging to self alone?
Do I selfishly hope and pray
For fortune's rays, not heeding the clouds
That darken another's day?

Am I caring more for the smiles of men
Than for God's approving smile?
Am I recklessly striving for worldly gain,
And losing my soul the while?

The spirits relentlessly ask these things—
Ah, me! could I answer "No"—
Their presence brings bitter remorse to me,
But I dare not bid them go.

THE MASTER CALLS.

[Written for The Christian Herald.

HARK! the Master calls "I need you;"
Listen to his gentle voice,
Then with food divine he'll feed you,
Bid your burdened heart rejoice.

Do not wait like doubting Thomas,
Till your eyes more clearly see,
Claim at once this precious promise,
"Heavy laden, come to me."

See the Cross on Calvary's mountain,
From its view no longer hide,
Look by faith and see the fountain,
Flowing from his pierced side.

Fling your banner to the breezes,
Battle in the Christian's war,
Each recruit you win for Jesus,
To your crown will add a star.

PRAYER FOR THE YOUNG.

I WAKE and see the morning light;
'Twas God who kept me all the night,
And now to him my voice I raise,
And give my thanks, my love and praise.
Guide me, O Lord, throughout this day,
That I may never from thee stray,
Help me thy holy law obey,
And walk the straight and narrow way,
That leads though heavenly gates above,
Where all is light, and joy, and love.

THE CLOSING PERIOD.

Did Daniel's Seventy-Week Period Close at the Crucifixion?

BY REV. A. T. STEED, M. A.

IN Daniel 9, and verse 24, it is stated that seventy weeks are determined (i. e., cut off or separated) upon the Jews and the Holy City, i. e., Jerusalem. This verse also states that the following events would be accomplished during those seventy weeks, namely: 1. the finishing of transgression. 2. The making an end of sin. 3. The making of reconciliation for iniquity. 4. The bringing in of an everlasting righteousness. 5. The sealing up of the vision and prophecy. 6. The anointing of the Most Holy.

The first four events were doubtless, in one sense, brought to pass by the death of Christ on the Cross, so far as believers are concerned. But, in another sense, they are still yet to come, and will not be accomplished till the Millennium takes place. The sixth event will also be fully accomplished then, for, at that time, the Lord Jesus will indeed be anointed, i. e., every one will own and recognize him as King. With regard to the fifth event, "the sealing up of the vision and prophecy," this sealing up still continues; and, therefore, the vision, so sealed up, is not yet fulfilled.

Now, what I want to show is, that the seventieth week is still future. It has not, as some think, already passed. I read a short time ago in a pamphlet, bearing on the grand subject of the Second Coming of Christ, that the seventieth week of Daniel was up at the time of the Lord's crucifixion, or thereabouts. But, surely, this could not have been so, as historical facts will prove.

What was the vision which Daniel is here told was to be sealed up for seventy weeks? We answer: The vision recorded in the eighth chapter of Daniel. Now, by bearing in mind the several features of that vision, it is clear that the vision was not fulfilled in its entirety at the time of the Lord's crucifixion. The vision was this: Daniel saw, 1. A he-goat rushing upon a ram and destroying it. 2. A little horn rising out of the four horns of the he-goat. This, Gabriel explained to be the rise of a king of fierce countenance out of one of the four kingdoms, in the latter days, into which the empire of Alexander the Great was to be divided. 3. The waxing great of this little horn or king. 4. The taking away of the daily sacrifice by this king. 5. The casting down of the place of the Sanctuary by this king. 6. The breaking of this king, when he had become great, and after a career of great sin and blasphemy, without hands, i. e., without human agency.

Now, some think, the seventieth week was up, when Christ was crucified. Then, if so, this vision was then fulfilled, for the words in the 24th verse are: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city. To seal up the vision." But this vision of Daniel was not surely, fulfilled at the time of Christ's crucifixion for (1) what about the little horn rising out of one of the four divisions, into which the empire of Alexander was divided. No such a king answering to the description of the person in Daniel, had then, or has since, arisen from one of those places. Then (2) what about this king after he has waxed great, taking away the daily sacrifice? True, Nebuchadnezzar took away the daily sacrifice, 588 B. C., and Antiochus Epiphanes, about 160 years before Christ, did the same thing; but the king mentioned in Daniel 8, could not have been intended for Nebuchadnezzar, for the vision did not commence to run till long after Nebuchadnezzar's death. And with regard to Antiochus Epiphanes, let me say, that, although he also took away the daily sacrifice, yet he did not set his name on the pinnacle of the temple, as the king in Daniel's vision is to do, but only an image of Jupiter. Therefore the king in the vision was not intended for Nebuchadnezzar nor Antiochus Epiphanes. Whom then? For the Antichrist yet to come—up to the time of the crucifixion no such a being had arisen, none has arisen since that time answering to the description given of him in Daniel 8. Therefore, it is most clear, that the seventieth week was not up when the Lord was crucified. It is, therefore, still to come. And this last hebdomad, in the seventy hebdomads, we are expecting will soon take place. The dates of Daniel all seem to point to the great fact, that we are approaching the end of this present age. There is a great Second Advent expectation amongst God's people at the present time, and eminently sanctified Christians have a presentiment that some great things are going to happen, and even amongst the unsanctified and ungodly there is a feverish restlessness and strange prognostication that we are on the eve of greater changes.

GOD'S GREAT COMMAND.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 16. Acts 17: 30; Luke 13: 1-5

PAUL'S declaration must have had a strange sound to the ears of the cultivated members of the Areopagus. A new philosophy, a new doctrine or a new theory of existence would have received respectful consideration, but the statement that God commanded men everywhere to repent would strike them as very common and prosaic. It made no distinction between classes nor between degrees of culture. It treated learned and ignorant alike. "Men everywhere" was the widest and most comprehensive description. It implied that repentance was necessary in the highest as in the lowest. It opened one wide door as the only way to life and only one. The same condition was applied to all, and the higher a man stood, the lower he would have to stoop. The condition of admission was neither social, nor mental, but moral. In this region men meet on common ground and the fact has kept many out of the kingdom. It is hard for the cultured and learned, as for the rich, to enter the kingdom of God. Christ knew that it would be so, but like John the Baptist, he made the word "Repent" the first word of his message. It was a necessary condition, because, unless a man admitted that he was a sinner and deplored his sin, he would not feel the need of a Saviour. The work of Christ for a man who did not repent would be as useless as a physician's prescription would be to a man who did not believe that he was diseased. The consciousness of sin and the desire for forgiveness is therefore from a philosophic standpoint the first step to such a salvation as Christ offered. Nor is the fact that repentance is demanded of all men unreasonable. The intelligent man of good moral character comparing his condition with that of the criminal behind prison bars may be surprised to learn that the same demand should be presented to both. But if he looks within his conscience tells him that he ought to repent. Sin is not a comparative or relative but a positive matter. Every man has the one question to ask himself, "Have I committed sin?" not "Have I sinned less or more than others?" If he has sinned—and who has not?—he must take his place in the category of sinners. He is one of those whom "God commandeth to repent."

THE Y. M. C. A. AT YALE.

THE following letter signed by the President and Secretary of the young Men's Christian Association of Yale University makes a valuable suggestion to the parents or friends of young men about to become students:

The Young Men's Christian Association of Yale University will do its utmost to extend a cordial greeting to all new students and welcome them to the best life of the place. We invite the co-operation of pastors, teachers, parents, and all who may know of men expecting to enter college in the Fall, in our efforts to meet them personally during the first few days of college life. Those who have had the experience can best estimate the importance of the first week at college, away from the restraints of home and a pastor's influence, in forming the right kind of new associations and receiving proper impressions. Any information by mail regarding previous connection with church or any Christian work will be valuable and this may be supplemented by a letter of introduction to the President or General Secretary of the Association to be presented personally. We are sure that all the college Associations will be glad to receive like information.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION.

THE date on this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has, for months, been a red-letter day on the calendars of thousands of Christian young men and women. It was the day fixed for the five great preparatory meetings of the delegates to the Twelfth International Christian Endeavor Convention in Montreal. These meetings are to be held in five of the largest churches in the city, to pray for a blessing on the meetings which begin the next day in the Government Drill Hall. That those prayers will be answered this year, as they have been in past years, none can doubt. When so many Christians meet together regardless of denominational lines, with one common object, and a common bond of love of their Lord, He who prayed that "they all may be one," will surely be present to bless them. It cannot but be a delightful spectacle to the Lord Jesus to see the vast gathering of his followers, putting aside the jealousies of the sects, and uniting together heart and soul for the promotion of his kingdom, and ready to accept the comradeship of any man who loves his Lord in sincerity, no matter what part of the church claims him as its member.

It is probable, from the notices already sent to the Committee at Montreal, that even the phenomenal number of delegates at the New York Convention last year will be exceeded. It would not surprise the committee if twenty-eight or thirty thousand delegates presented themselves. The significance of such an assembly is increased when we remember that this vast army of young Christians is only representative. They come from Societies numbering about a million and a half. Besides these, there are the six hundred Societies in England, and the unknown number in Australia and other lands. It will be a sublime and suggestive spectacle, and when we take into account the fact that the same objects and aims, which bring together these hosts, animate the Methodist and Baptist organizations, who unhappily hold aloof, although working in the same cause and for the same Master against the common enemy, the result is one to gladden the heart of every Christian who prays "Thy kingdom come."

The delegates are coming from every section of the Union and from every province of Canada. One large delegation started on June 20 from California, and will travel 3,422 miles each way to attend the Convention, and each delegate's traveling expenses will be $150. Their route will be Ogden, Col., Denver, Chicago, Toronto, and thence down the St. Lawrence to Montreal. Each incoming delegation will be met a hundred miles from Montreal by a representative of the reception committee, who will give them all necessary instructions and pilot them to the places where they are to stay. All the hotels have been engaged, and thousands of citizens have thrown open their houses to the visitors, declining compensation, so that the necessary expenses of the Reception Committee may be made as small as possible.

The meetings will be held in the Government Drill Hall and in a mammoth tent erected on the land on the opposite side of the avenue. The Hall, a picture of which appears on this page, is an immense stone building, absolutely fire-proof, and with an iron and glass roof, electric light and excellent ventilation. It will be tastefully draped with bunting, and the air kept fresh by means of electric fans. On both sides of the main auditorium are rows of smaller rooms capable of holding from five to six hundred persons. These will serve for committee and delegation gatherings. The Drill Hall, apart from the side rooms opening into it, will seat 9,000 people, and the tent about the same number. For each there is a separate programme, as detailed in these columns on June 14, and the speakers have been so distributed that the audiences will have equal advantages, and the most eminent speakers will address each assembly. Should the members exceed the capacity of both auditoriums there will be overflow meetings in the churches of the city. The choirs, to the organization of which much care and thought have been given, will consist of 350 voices for the Hall and 250 for the tent. The conductors will be Mr. L. F. Lindsay, of St. Louis, Mo., and Mr. W. A. Coates, who will act alternately in the Drill Hall and in the tent. The instruments will include two large grand pianos, and the two largest organs that can be secured. The instrumentalists will include Mr. R. Burley, of Rochester, N. Y., and the three Park Sisters, of New York.

At a recent meeting of the committees, the Treasurer, Mr. Robt. Greig, said that the financial aspect had by special request of the United Society executive been kept in the background. The convention was not for the purpose of raising money. The committee, however, expected that at the close of the convention it would be quite solvent. The estimated cost of the convention would be $13,000; $5,000 had been subscribed by Canadian Societies and it was felt to be the duty of Canada to assume the financial responsibility for the convention. Sir Donald Smith, Mr. S. Carsley, Messrs Ames and Holden, and others had guaranteed $500 each, and many merchants lesser sums to the total of $5,000 in case there should be a deficit, when it could be levied pro rata. The committee had experienced no difficulty in collecting the necessary funds.

DR. F. E. CLARKE.
President of Society of Christian Endeavor.

An interesting feature of the convention will be the reception of Dr. F. E. Clark the founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society whose portrait appears on this page. Dr. Clark has spent the past year in a tour around the world and has assisted at the organization of many Christian Endeavor Societies some of which were in heathen lands. He received a very hearty reception in Australia where Christian Endeavor is flourishing. One of his last receptions before sailing for the United States was at a convention of all the English Societies.

Happy Hawaiians.

A People who can Always be Cheerful, no Matter what Happens—A Hawaiian School

HAWAII'S fate still hangs in the balance, and it is yet uncertain whether the islanders, who so lately discarded the rule of Queen Liliuokolani, will permanently have a republican form of government or presently return to a monarchy. Hawaii has been fortunate in escaping the horrors that usually attend revolutions, and to-day its business, its society and its affairs generally go on almost as smoothly as though the sister of David Kalakaua still occupied the throne and wore the gem-studded crown of the Kamehamehas.

In a former issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, reference was made to the social life and customs of the Hawaiians. They are a sunny-tempered, easy-going people, as widely different from the ferocious cannibals of early missionary days as can well be imagined. Their juvenility of character lasts far into manhood and womanhood, and helps them to face cheerfully many a situation that would otherwise seem gloomy enough.

One pleasant feature of life in these islands is the entire absence of beggars. So kindly and generous is the native heart that no one need go hungry or unsheltered, since food and accommodation are almost thrust upon those who need them. Poor men live with their rich relatives, and sometimes tax their hospitality for months. Quarrels are very rare, and it is a common saying that a Kanaka (native) will never quarrel with a white man.

Our illustration shows a group of bright Hawaiian pupils of the principal seminary in Honolulu. These interesting young Kanakas enjoy really excellent educational facilities, when one considers how recent is the civilization in their islands. The seminary in question is modelled after similar institutions in the United States, and the course combines instruction in sewing, cooking, music, deportment and the usual branches. Eight wide-awake Christian ladies are the instructors, and with a school of 135 healthy, robust native girls, they have little time left for leisure.

Christian education has been a prominent object in all the plans and work of the American Mission in the Sandwich Islands. In the early missionary days, native boys and girls were taken into Christian families and trained there. It was not until 1831 that schools were opened. The are now found at every point of importance, althought more are needed. What are known as the Kamehameha schools were founded by Mrs. Bernice Pauahi Bishop, a Hawaiian princess, and the last of the royal race of the Kamehamehas who refused the throne when it was offered to her. At her death, she bequeathed them an ample endowment. Queen Emma, too, was a warm friend of the schools, and Queen Liliuokalani also took a deep personal interest in the education of her subjects. Liliuokalani was a woman of considerable culture and a good musician. Some of her musical compositions are very popular throughout Hawaii, and her "Maikai Waipio" chorus is a standard favorite in the schools.

Nowhere in the world is the love of flowers so general as in Hawaii. They are skilfully woven into garlands and wreaths and are used to deck the person on festive occasions. There is no prettier sight than a native dinner party where all the guests, and the host also, are adorned with fragrant garlands on head, shoulders and neck. Visitors to the islands are delighted by the floral welcome they receive and it is not an uncommon sight to witness departing guests almost covered with flowers, waiting at the wharf for the hour of sailing. Even when the matrons of Honolulu go to market, it is not an uncommon thing to see their flowing holokus (loosely-fitting gowns) festooned with jasmine roses, hibiscus and a variety of brilliant flowers, which scatter sweet odors around as they walk.

The rising generation of Hawaiians have many advantages which their parents did not possess. Religious and secular training have kept pace together on these islands and the standard of education has greatly improved. It is probable that under a new and liberal administration, the country may progress even more rapidly and that it may, in turn, become a great evangelical centre, whose influence will radiate to the most distant isles of the South Pacific.

Be Prompt in Duty.

WE do not properly distribute our time. We do not do each duty as it rises. Many of us take too much time for pleasure, or for sleep, or for business, or for something in which we are especially interested, and so are compelled to let go things of great importance. Husband time—do not waste it—make it count, and it is wonderful how much can be accomplished. We can always find time to help others and to guide the wandering sheep back to the fold:

> How many sheep are straying,
> Lost from the Saviour's fold:
> Upon the lonely mountains
> They shiver with the cold.
> Within the tangled thickets,
> Where poison vines do creep
> And over rocky ledges
> Wander the poor lost sheep.

The Poor Mother-Drudge.

"MY mother gets me up, builds the fire, gets my breakfast and sends me off," said a bright youth to a writer in The Household. "Then she gets my father up and gets his breakfast and sends him off. Then she gives the other children their breakfast, and sends them to school; and then she and the baby have their breakfast." "How old is the baby?" was asked. "Oh, she is 'most two, but she can talk and walk as well as any of us." "Are you well paid?" "I get two dollars a week, and father gets two dollars a day." "How much does your mother get?" With a bewildered look the boy said, "Mother, why she don't work for anybody." "I thought you said she worked for all of you." "Oh, yes, for us, she does; but there ain't no money in it."

He will Make a Man.

WILLIE'S mother had trained him up a strict abstainer. He was now in his first situation. At a certain hour beer was brought to the workingmen; the foreman poured out some and offered it to Willie, saying: "Now, my lad, drink success." Willie quietly replied: "I'm a teetotaler, and never touch the drink." Irritated at the boy's reply, the foreman said: "None of that nonsense. We'll have no teetotalism here. Take the drink at once." Willie said: "I promised my mother I would never touch the drink, and I never will." "Look here," said the man, "we are not going to have two masters here, so drink it up." "I cannot, and I will not!" said Willie.

Mad with the boy's rebellion against his orders, the foreman said: "This is all nonsense! You will have it in you or over you!"

"Well," said Willie, "I can't help it. I will never drink. You can throw it over me if you like. I have brought here a clean jacket and a good character. You may spoil my jacket if you will; but you shall never spoil my character."

Struck with the boy's earnest look, the man's better nature prevailed, and turning away, he said to his mates: "He's a rum one, but I believe he will make a man." The prophecy was right, for to-day Willie is a prominent temperance worker, and is at the head of a large establishment noted for their intelligence and high principle.

A MORNING PRAYER.

STRENGTH for the day I humbly ask,
Faith in the coming morrow,
But not one drop of weal or woe
From future days to borrow;
I'll trust the hand that measures out
My cup of joy or sorrow.

And when the day is past and gone,
My grateful heart upswelling,
A hymn of praise shall joyful raise,
Thy love and goodness telling;
I'll waft it up beyond the stars,
Where all my hopes are dwelling.

PARENTAL AUTHORITY.

LET no one imagine that a child's faults are only those of immaturity, writes Charlotte Whiton Calkins. Without the cardinal virtues of truthfulness and obedience, it is impossible to build up anything like character. The commands may be few—the fewer the better—but once given, they must never be disregarded. Punishment of some sort (and the writer is a believer in gentle measures) must as inevitably follow disobedience as the setting follows the rising of the sun, and this without regard to the consequences, whether trivial or important, of the disobedience.

Opposed to such firm and decisive exercise of authority, are two kinds of interference with a child's development. One is the interference which comes from an earnest desire that the child shall grow up free from all possible defects in mind and in body. The most anxious watchfulness is maintained. Nothing escapes the vigilant eye of the parental censor. The child is trained till all mental and moral spontaneity are lost, and he becomes at best a mere automaton, moving only as the strings are pulled.

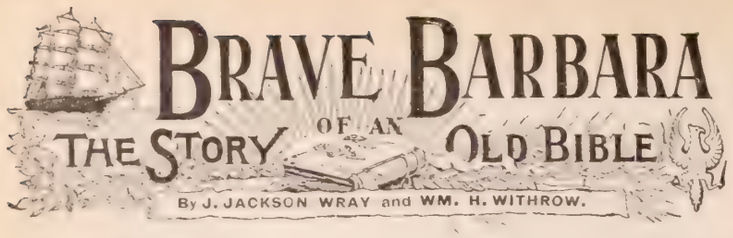
The other form of interference is a kind of haphazard way of thwarting a child's plans and wishes, with the vague idea that, if we are not so doing, we are failing in our duty. "A child must be governed" is our theory. His tastes may be reasonable, his plans involve no harm, but we may have an uneasy sense that we are not doing as we should, unless he is made to feel all the time that he is under our control.

Besides the two classes of over-authoritative parents, there are, of course, always those who fail to recognize that any control is needed, who throw off all sense of responsibility under the impression that somehow or other their children will grow up and "come out all right."

The whole difference between over-government, and no government, may be summed up in the remark of a friend in commenting upon two young people, just emerging from childhood:

"This daughter would have made a fine girl if she had not had too much mother; and the other is almost as badly off, though there is more hope for her, because she has had too little mother!"

Thus it will be seen that even the gentlest rule the world knows—the rule of a loving parent—may be abused, to the child's hurt.



CHAPTER XVII.

AN EARLY CAMP-MEETING.

REGINALD PEMBERTON went forth an exile from his father's house. He had nothing but the rough clothes of homespun in which he stood. His first thought was to go to the house of Brave Barbara; for he felt, that, at any rate, she would counsel him wisely and administer what amount of the true balsam of comfort her fine conscience would allow. But then came the thought of Gracie, whom he loved as his own soul. No, no; he must fight his battles alone, nor involve either her or her parents in his disgrace. What, then, should he do?

He turned his steps and bore his heart-ache to the Quaker settlement, and respectfully asked for work. Josiah Whiteside had a strong favor for the pleasant and attractive youth. After hearing his story, and finding in it a firm, heroic spirit, something akin to his own doctrine of passive resistance to persecution, which the history of his sect had made so illustrious, he felt strongly inclined to do what the youth desired. He thought, too, that it would be better for Reginald to remain within call of his angry father, and that he, Josiah Whiteside, might be able to make peace between father and son.

"Well," said he, "I am sorry for thy mishaps, and in the hope that it may lead to the repairing of the breach between thee and thy father, I will give thee work and wages."

The effect of all this on the mind and temper of Colonel Pemberton may well be imagined. It must not be thought, however, that this stately gentleman was disturbed only in temper, prejudice and pride. He dearly loved his boy. Redgie was his favorite son; and his disobedience, or, as he preferred to call it, his rebellion, caused him exceeding bitter sorrow of soul. This, however, he would not acknowledge; but, on the contrary, he assumed an additional severity of speech and a more imperious aspect and deportment than ever.

It was the Colonel's meek and gentle lady who caught the brunt of her husband's vexation, and all the more did it affect her because she saw, underneath it all, the keenness of his heart's distress. Of course, all this was worse to bear because of her strong sympathy with Reginald and her inability to pour oil on the troubled waters; for Colonel Pemberton was not a man to be interfered with when his notions of the militant authority of a father were concerned.

And so it was that the cloud which had gathered across the sky of the Pemberton settlement and had gloomed the neighboring homesteads was dark indeed, and was like enough to grow darker, until, as Brave Barbara dared to prophesy, "the sun should shine the brighter for it when it passed away."

After a few weeks or months had passed—for Methodist "circuits" in those days included large stretches of the country,—that active itinerant, Elder Losee, cantered again into the clearing of the Heck settlement, intent, as usual, on his Master's business. He and his steed, both, were a good deal spattered with mud; his garments were a good deal frayed from contact with the tangled underbrush of the forest ways; but he was full of heart and hope; for everywhere his words had been received as the messages of God.

In answer to his affectionate inquiries as to the welfare and progress of the converts won to Christ during his last visit, he was informed that all of them had stood fast, and were like enough to continue in well-doing.

And not only so," said Paul Heck, who was the last man in the world to exaggerate, "the good work has gone on. Sunday and week-day services have been held, and still other souls have been saved of the Lord."

"Hallelujah!" exclaimed the preacher in the joy of his heart at hearing such good news; and who are they who have been doing the Lord's work? Let me know them all, for it may be that the Lord hath need of some of them. The harvest truly is plenteous throughout this whole region, and the fields are white thereto, but the laborers are few."

As he spoke with kindling eyes and eager [illegible] clearly that he was spending his own energies in a way which must end in a break-down at no distant date; and that unless other laborers could be found to divide the toil, there might well be an end of all. It appeared that the whole Heck family had been sowers and reapers in this new and promising field; that Philip Embury, John Lawrence, and Lucky Mike had given themselves small rest that the good work should be kept a-going, and again and again the wandering evangelist was constrained to point the exciting story with exclamations of gratitude and praise.

"And not among the least, but best and strongest," said Brave Barbara, "and a workman that needeth not be ashamed, but rather to be promoted to a higher place, is the young Pemberton, whom the Lord gave captive to your own bow when you were here before."

Then followed the story of Reginald's persecution, of his religious fortitude, of his exile from his father's homestead, and of the wonderful way in which he had laid hold upon the people as a simple powerful ambassador for Christ. On the following Sunday, Losee, anxious to take completer measure of the youth, called on Reginald to pray and make an exhortation during the afternoon gathering.

After supper the preacher asked the young and promising recruit to take a walk with him by the bank of the St. Lawrence. In the mellow light of the setting sun the two strolled along the wooded margin of the stately stream. Reginald had many questions to ask; his soul was athirst for knowledge of the highest of all wisdom; and the preacher, in thoughts that breathed and words that burned led him, as his Master's under-shepherd, through green pastures and by the side of still waters, until both felt that it was indeed good to be there.

Then Losee related to his young companion the story of his evangelistic wanderings during the last eight weeks among the scattered settlements of Ontario. He had covered well nigh a thousand miles of travel, had encountered much privation, undergone many hardships, and had withstood the brunt of some opposition—

"But," said the preacher, waxing eloquent with his hands outstretched and his face aglow, "all those were as nothing compared with the reception that was everywhere given to the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

"You may well say that, sir!" responded Reginold, with strong feeling, "It seems to me that to be a preacher of the Gospel of Jesus is to do just the grandest thing that can be done out of heaven. To tell poor sinners out of the heart what is in the heart, and say, 'What the Lord hath done for me he can do for thee!"

Then Elder Losee stood still. He laid his one hale hand on the young man's arm. He fixed a pair of keen grey eyes upon his face, and said, "My brother, the Lord hath need of thee. You must come with me!"

"Come, where?" said Reginald, catching his breath in strong surprise.

"Wherever the Lord shall show the way," said Losee, solemnly. "I believe you are called of God to preach the Gospel. You dare not be disobedient to the heavenly vision. When the Lord sent Philip to preach Jesus to the 'man of Ethiopia,' he said, 'Arise, and go;' and he arose and went. That's the command that your Saviour sends to you. You may not, must not shrink from the call!"

For a few moments Reginald walked slowly on in silence. His eyes, so the preacher thought, had a certain far-away look in them, as he fixed them on the unseen future, and then lifted them to the stars, which were beginning to light the sky. At last he paused, and turning to his companion, he said,

"When I gave myself to the Lord Jesus, I gave myself entirely to do his will, in any way and in every way he should show me. For that I was constrained to leave my home, and offend my father, and grieve my mother, though — though — it — nearly — broke my heart."

Here the young man was quite overcome. The floodgates of strong filial affection were unloosed, and he burst into a passion of tears.

"And may it not be," said Losee, stroking his arm tenderly and lovingly, "that in that way the Lord intended to set you free. Perhaps it was in that way that he said, 'Loose him and let him go.' And not that the home-bond should be finally broken, but that it may be bound again and strengthened by the love of Jesus. Perhaps, nay, I verily believe that you shall, depart from them for a season, that your father may "receive you forever."

"God grant it," said the young man fervently, and then paused again.

Losee and Paul Heck walked from the barn together, and by their side, Brave Barbara.

"William Losee," quoth my heroine, "the Lord hath sent you a comrade. Take the youth in hand, he will prove a valiant soldier of the Cross."

"Can you lend him a horse?" said the preacher, with a smile, turning to Paul Heck, "I want him to ride circuit with me."

"Ay, that I can, and will, for as long as he likes," said the warm-hearted and generous Irishman.

And so the very next day Reginald, in his home-spun garb, rode away with Losee, astride of Paul Heck's sorrel colt; but not before he, in company with the preacher, and by Brave Barbara's advice, had made a final appeal to the passionate and unyielding Colonel to take him to his heart again, though he did not now seek to be reinstated in his home.

The old soldier's severe embargo was relaxed sufficiently to allow the young "rebel" to give farewell greetings to his sisters and to receive his mother's blessing. Then he went forth; and God was with him. Saddle he had none. Paul Heck had no such spare article to lend him; but instead of that, he rode upon a folded sheep skin which the sympathetic farmer had put at his disposal.

In this wise were the early Methodist preachers summoned to their godly work, like as David was summoned from the sheep-cotes, Elisha from the plough, Amos from the herds, or Simon Peter from the fishing-nets. Without staff or scrip, or money in their purses, or any other resources except those that were lodged in the Bank of Faith, they went forth on their spiritual knight-errantry, intent only on this—to win the world for Christ.

As to the thoughts and feelings of the grizzled old soldier, Colonel Pemberton, when he found that his son had not only cast in his lot with "those despicable Methodists," but worse, even than that, had gone off with a beggarly Methodist preacher, these may be better imagined than described. He had little to say on the subject; only this:

"It's a thousand pities that he did not fall honorably on the battle-field, or glide out of life in the prisons of the revolution."

The old man spoke hotly, cruelly, unrighteously; but he will live, God willing, to come to a better mind.

And all this while the Heck Settlement was growing in numbers and in neighbors, and Ballygran became quite an important centre of religious life and Methodist activity. The oldest and most flourishing Methodist Society in Canada had its home here; and here was held the first Canadian Camp-meeting, the parent and forerunner of some of the most wonderful evangelical conventions, that the world has ever seen. Further arrivals of Loyalist refugees Methodists, Quakers, Cavaliers, many of the latter accompanied by domestic slaves, increased the population of the St. Lawrence settlements, which held now quite a numerous community, and laid the strong foundation of the populous cities, towns and villages of to-day. And so it came to pass, that the Reverend Darius Dunham, the presiding Elder in charge of the whole Canadian Methodist work, made arrangements for holding a huge Camp-meeting. The announcement of the coming event created immense excitement through all the country side.

It was indeed a famous business, that great camp-meeting. A lovely grove of stately beeches and maples with their tall and clean-skinned trunks and widely spreading boughs was selected for the scene of the grand engagements of the time. It was bordered by the noble St. Lawrence, whose waters at that point were beautifully broad, and its banks most picturesque. All the underbrush was diligently cleared away, and whatever moderate degree of leveling was required was carefully done.

A rough platform, sheltered by an awning of beechen boughs was erected for the preachers, and a number of rude tents or booths were reared to provide sleeping accommodations for the many visitors from afar who could not possibly be housed, however hospitable the inhabitants might be. Great was the activity in everybody's kitchen more or less. In the spacious and roomy kitchen of the Hecks and others, preparations were something tremendous, for Brave Barbara had charge over the victualing arrangements, and so she set the example in bonding supplies as if the camp were about to stand a siege.

In this department the good Quakers from the Whiteside Settlement rendered admirable help, and the whole family threw themselves into the friendly fray which showed that the limitations of traditional Quakerdom were being largely thrown away. Strange to say, the spirit of old Virginian hospitality so far resumed its sway over Colonel Pemberton, that he cheerfully supplied material for much cheer, and allowed Mammy Dinah and Aunt Chloe, under the superintendence of the ladies of the household, to cook and bake and roast to their very hearts' content.

The camp-meeting was "opened" by a special service for prayer and praise. It was held on the Saturday evening, as a fitting preparation for the Sabbath, the "high day" of the occasion.

Scarcely had the forest aisles begun to re-echo the songs of Zion and the notes of prayer, then the cries of penitence and petition mingled with them, and it was patent everywhere that there were gathering to that forest sanctuary a people prepared of the Lord. It was a standing wonder to the little settlement as to where all the people were coming from.

"The people are coming together from all the four quarters of the land," said the honest Quaker, Josiah Whiteside. "I wot not that there were so many men and women in the entire colony! Whoever led them to troop together thus?"

"The Lord of Hosts is his name," said Barbara Heck, to whom the question was addressed. "He it is who is bringing a multitude, multitudes into the valley of decision."

The staid and matter-of-fact Quaker was silenced by the force of his own astonishment. It had never entered into his idea of things that the "heavens could be so shaken that the things which cannot be shaken may remain." And truly it was wonderful! For fully fifty miles up and down the river St. Lawrence, the colonists came in boat and raft and bateux. Not a few swarthy representatives of the Indian tribes came in their bark canoes to witness a series of services which they could not comprehend, but of which they felt the influence and power. Especially was this true of the Ojibbeways. These fellow-tribesmen of Tookaluska and Oloona had been in some measure prepared by what they had heard from the lips of the converted chief.

By this time both John Lawrence and Philip Embury, under the eager tuition of the Indian, had come to be able to speak in the soft and melodious language of the tribe, and the same skill was shared by Carrie Heck, now the happy wife of Philip, who found in Oloona a willing and even more effective tutor than her brother. And so it came to pass that the hitherto all but despised and neglected Indian races were brought, thanks to the camp-meeting, within the widening circle of Methodist influence that began to belt and bless and dominate the growing Dominion of the West.

Probably the strange effect of that great moment in the forest crowd culminated in the service held on the Sunday evening. On that occasion it seemed as though the widely scattered farms and settlements had pretty nearly denuded themselves of their inhabitants to swell the multitude which gathered to hear the Word of the Lord. The new director of the Canada Mission, Elder Dunham, William Losee's colleague and superior, conducted the proceedings. Like Losee, he was comparatively young in years, and like him was unusually well-favored in countenance, and was possessed of even greater magnetic power.

In the course of his soul-stirring exhortations, Dunham, who was somewhat scholarly for his times, repeated a free translation of some of the verses of Thomas of Celano's tremendous lyric, "Dies Irae, Dies Illa":

Think, Lord Jesus, my salvation
Caused Thy wondrous Incarnation!
Leave me not to reprobation.

Faint and weary, Thou hast sought me;
On the Cross of suffering, bought me.
Shall such grace be vainly bought me?

Ah, that day of tears and mourning!
From the dust of earth returning
Man for judgment must prepare him!
Spare, O God, in mercy spare him!

The strange spell of that marvelous hymn, which the best translation cannot adequately render, had an effect that Dunham, with all his hopeful fervor, never thought possible; and Brave Barbara, who stood by his side to conduct the singing, was constrained to lay her hand upon his arm and say, in whispered awe, more intense than sound, "The day of Pentecost hath fully come!"

Then the pent-up emotions of the hour were let loose, and, then and there, at any rate, it might be said that the crowd "had all things in common," and that one universal possession was an overwhelming consciousness of the presence and power of God.

The Persecuted Nestorians.

Esther, the Wife of Deacon Abraham, Visits England in their Behalf

THERE is now visiting England a young Syrian lady, who comes from the city of Oroomiah, in Persia, to plead the cause of the Nestorians. She is Esther, the wife of the well-known Deacon Abraham, who for many years past has conducted a mission and orphanage in Persia in behalf of the persecuted Nestorians. The Nestorians have dwelt among the mountains for twenty-six centuries, a captive and persecuted people. It is well known that when the Jews rejected their Messiah, some of the apostles went to these tribes who eagerly embraced the Gospel, and became the first missionaries of the Christian faith to India and China. The famous Prester John, of whom so many legends are told, was of Nestorian race, and laid the foundations of Christianity in Thibet. But though once so enlightened, the oppression of the Turkish rule has crushed the spirit of this noble race. They are not protected by the law. Any one may rob or murder a Nestorian with impunity. At the present time they are sunk in superstition and ignorance, yet they cling with a passionate affection to the traditions of what was given to them by the apostles, chiefly Thomas and Thaddeus, and to the Bible, for which they have an intense reverence, though but few can read it.

ESTHER, THE NESTORIAN.

Esther's father escaped when a child from a wholesale massacre of nearly all his family by the Kurds, to the mountain district where Esther was brought up, and though of high descent, like Rebekah and Rachel, she kept sheep upon the hills. Left an orphan at ten years of age, she resolved on gaining an education in the American schools she had heard of in Oroomiah. Two years the child watched for an opportunity, until a preacher came to her uncle's house, who was willing to take her to Oroomiah. There her great talents soon excited interest. In three years she passed the examinations for which others had studied for eight years, but her health broke down from overwork, and she had to leave the school. It was at Dr. Shedd's, the American missionary's house, that Deacon Abraham, then left a widower, offered her marriage, and the wedding was celebrated in the presence of many eminent men among the Nestorians.

Here she has been a loving and devoted mother to the forty destitute orphans. Last year Esther went to England, her baby in her arms, determined to plead herself for missionaries to be sent to her mountaineer relations, so cruelly persecuted and oppressed by Turkish rule, where not one single teacher has ever gone to dwell. She also asks for a medical lady to help her in her work in Oroomiah and the villages near. Workers were invited to go to this intelligent, fine race, the children of "Abraham, the friend of God?" and who speak the same language used by our Lord himself. Esther herself led many interesting meetings in London and gave very entertaining details of their customs illustrating the Bible. She speaks English well, and in her picturesque dress, and winning manners is as attractive in person, as she is in mind and character. A translation of Syriac letter from the Orphans of Oroomiah, to Esther Abraham contains the following passages:

"In the first place, accept much love and many salaams from all the boys and girls, to you our dear Sis. Esther. We miss you very much and are anxious to know about your health. We shall be very pleased to have a letter from you saying you are better. We shall never forget all the trouble you have taken with us, and your motherly care of us. We shall thank you all our lives.

"Will you kindly offer our grateful salutations to those Christian friends in England who so kindly stand in the place of parents to us, and try to supply all our needs. If you ask how we are by the grace of our Saviour, we have been preserved through all difficulties, and we had such a happy prayer-week in January; we had much blessing, and many sinners made confession of their sins. We had always prayer for all friends, and for you, that God would take away every stumbling block out of your path, and prosper your work for his orphan children, unworthy as we are. We hope you will pray always for your grateful children." It is expected that Esther will succeed in her mission. Much sympathy has been awakened in her behalf.

HANNINGTON'S GRAVE.

ALTHOUGH the story of the murder of Bishop Hannington was told five years ago, it is only recently that the place of his burial was disclosed. It was pointed out to his successor, Bishop Tucker, by a young man of Uganda who had seen the body buried under the floor of a house. He said it was in an iron box. The following narrative of the discovery as told by Dr. Tucker is printed in the current number of the Missionary Herald: At 6.30 this morning, with six men, I commenced the search. In half an hour our efforts were successful, and the top of the box was discovered. But it had evidently been disturbed since it was placed there. Instead of lying flat, it was at a considerable angle. The lid also had been broken. The people had evidently suspected that something was buried under the floor of the house, and my idea is that, believing it to be ivory, they had made an attempt to get at it. There was no doubt whatever as to identification. Mr. Fisher kindly gave me a long tin-lined box, it was quite impossible to remove the remains in the old one. Dr. Baxter and I put in a lining of sweetly scented grass and then we two alone in my tent laid all that was left of the dear bishop in the new case. The next day, we had a very solemn service of communion, and in prayer for the Church militant specially thanked and praised God for his servant, Bishop Hannington, whose earthly remains were with us in camp. All in the party were deeply touched, and, I feel sure, have been drawn nearer to God by the affecting events. I hope to carry the bishop's remains to Mengo, and with the Church's service to bury them there—the fittest place, it seems to me, for them to await the resurrection morning.

THE MODEL MISSION.

The Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., is making excellent progress. The auditorium of the new building will be completed in time for the autumn work. It will hold 1,200 persons. Never have there been larger audiences either at the central station or at the branches or more conversions or more successful work for Christ. The one pressing need is money with which so much good could be done. Mr. George W. Wheeler, who has been active in the management from the first, will be glad to receive any contributions for the work.

A Spurgeon Memorial.

The Monument Erected over his Grave at Norwood, England

SOON after the death of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, it was decided that a monument should be raised over his grave in Norwood Cemetery, near London. On Wednesday, April 19, the ceremony of unveiling the monument was performed in the presence of several officials of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, together with a number of delegates to the conference of the Pastors' College. The memorial consists of a plinth measuring thirteen feet by eleven feet by six feet high. Rising from this is a tier of three steps, upon which is erected a handsome panelled and coped tomb. In the front panel of the tomb is a fine portrait medallion of Mr. Spurgeon, executed in marble from photographs. Immediately below it, and resting upon the steps, is a cushion of polished red granite with an open Bible in marble, bearing the text, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." In the front of the pedestal is a granite door leading to the vault below, engraved with the simple inscription, "Here lies the body of Charles Haddon Spurgeon, waiting for the appearing of his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." It is intended to add the following inscription on the side panel:

C. H. SPURGEON.

E'er since by faith I saw the stream

In many autograph albums Mr. Spurgeon wrote these two verses. An illustration showing the new monument is given on this page.

A SWEARER REBUKED.

AN officer who was much addicted to profane swearing was once visiting a deep mine in Cornwall. He was attended by one of the pious miners employed in the works, for in Cornwall there are many godly miners. During his visit to the pit the officer uttered many profane expressions; and as he ascended in company with the miner, finding it a long way, he said to him, with an oath, "If it be so far down to your work, how far is it to the bottomless pit?" The honest miner promptly and seriously replied, "I do not know how far it is, sir, but I believe that the rope by which we are drawn up should break, you would be there in a minute." The swearer was rebuked, and uttered no more oaths while in the company of the miner. "A word spoken in due season, how good is it!"

DARKNESS IN CHINA.

AN appeal is made by Mr. John A. Anderson, in China's Millions, in behalf of the unevangelized aboriginal tribes. Three are mentioned—the Ming-kia, the Mo-soh and the Lolos. In the Ta-li valley there are three hundred villages, numbering many tens of thousands of souls. Mr. Anderson says, "So far as I know, nothing has been done to give them the Gospel in their own tongue. They are very accessible. Both men and women come freely to me for medicine, although often unable to talk Chinese. . . . Although my knowledge of the comparative needs of the other provinces is necessarily very small, I believe there is not such a sad sight throughout the eighteen provinces of China as that of which I write. Here are whole tribes, whole peoples, without even a chance of knowing about the Saviour's love."

A BOY PHILANTHROPIST.

A SOCIETY in Paris makes an annual gift of a gold medal to persons who have distinguished themselves by acts of kindness. To the general surprise, one of the recent recipients was a boy of sixteen years of age, named Luuis Bourzat. When the record of the acts which had convinced the society of his fitness for the honor was read, the following list astonished the audience: Both his father and mother were in delicate health, and he had two brothers. Seeing his family suffering from hunger, he set himself to work. He began by helping his mother to manage her dairy. Then a lame girl, with a wooden leg, was cared for, and finally cured of a dangerous illness. But all this generosity ran away with the profits of the dairy. Louis was not cast down. "I will take a basket," he said, and I will sell fruit about Paris." And so he did. Then he learned the trade of a carpenter, working by day and going to a night-school in the evenings. He taught a consumptive workman to read, and made him share his room. He took care of him in his dying moments with the devotion of a son. The neighbors of Louis Bourzat told of all these kind acts, and the boy was quite astonished when he found himself looked upon as a hero.

Too Slow

JUST COMMON FOLKS.*

A HUNDRED humble songsters trill
The notes that to their lays belong,
Where just one nightingale might fill
The place with its transcendent song,
And thus Fame comes, and with its smile
A soul with lasting greatness cloaks,
And leaves a thousand else the while
To be for aye just common folks.

If only sweetest bells were rung,
How we should miss the minor chimes!
If only grandest poets sung
There'd be no humble little rhymes.
The modest, clinging vines add grace
Unto the forest's giant oaks,
And 'mid earth's mighty is a place
To people with just common folks.

Fate has not lifted them above
The level of the human plane;
They share with men a brother love,
In touch with pleasure and with pain.
One great, far-reaching brotherhood,
With common burdens, common yokes,
And common wrongs and common good,—
God's army of just common folks.

EVERY DAY RELIGION.

THERE is as much necessity to-day to seek and save the rich as the poor. A very rich man in a certain city heard me preach, and sat in front of my pulpit, and some inspiration gave me courage enough to take my wife, and, calling a cab, to drive out of town a little way and go after him. His wife and himself seemed to enjoy our visit very much; we had a talk of half an hour, and it came around to the point where it seemed a desirable thing to pray with that man, and I suggested it might be pleasant if we had a moment's prayer before we went away. When he got up from his knees tears were rolling down his cheeks, and he said, "I want to thank you for doing that, for you know my wife and I have lived together for thirty years, and had our own home, and no man ever came to pray with us before." It is necessary to go after folks to save them. Under the present condition of things there is no necessity for any church to have empty seats if Christians but follow out the spirit of the New Testament, and go after people, and seek for them, and save them.

We must convince people that we are not only seeking after souls, but that as men and women we are interested in everything that interests them. The expression, "saving souls," gets to be a cant expression. Many people drift away from the Church because they believe it is a canting expression. I have heard a man speak with unction about saving souls, who had drawn thirty per cent dividends from a tenement house that meant destruction to the men and women living there. The Master was always anxious about the bodies as well as the souls of men; he was as careful to heal them of fever, and make the lame man well again, as to save souls. You cannot read the life of Jesus without feeling that he was interested in men and women as well as souls. And I have found that all the souls I have been able to reach and save have lived in human bodies, and it made a great deal of difference whether they had three square meals a day or not; it made a difference what kind of wages they had; whether they were treated justly or not. We are dealing not with souls simply, not with something vague and ethereal, but with men and women in the flesh; and if we can convince them that the people in the Church are interested in them as men and women you can fill your church. They will come.

A DAUGHTER'S TRIUMPH.†

A YEAR or two ago in Mr. Randolph's store, in New York, we came upon a remarkable book: "The great discourse of Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God. A topical arrangement and and analysis of all his words, recorded in the New Testament, separated from the Context." The compiler, a layman eminent in culture and position, has suppressed his own name. This may have been desired thus to give himself more freedom in relating his personal experience. His work is well done. His classification of the material of our Saviour's discourses is intelligent and faithful. It will convince many that the teachings of our Lord are much more comprehensive than they had supposed, and of greater value than all prophetic and apostolic inspiration combined.

He describes his early condition in the following sentences: "At middle life I found myself without a creed—a Christian neither in faith nor work, out of sympathy with Christian ethics as adapted to the use of modern society, and deeply antagonistic to organic Christianity as manifested in the Church. . . . I was drifting rapidly away from the religious traditions of my youth, flying no flag, yet not prepared to cast overboard the banner of the Cross, my couse darkened by speculative doubts, and the philosophic craft, such as it was, in which I had embarked my soul battered by continual and bitter tempests."

But at last he summoned courage to escape from the conflict and suffering: "There came a time, however, that I felt that I must get my bearings and know plainly where I lay with reference to the God of my youth—his dealings with me and mine with him—or that I must face, godless and alone, that gray, awful waste of waters whose horizon is eternity, with no pole-star in the infinite night, and no hope of a haven at any time. To live longer in such a state was neither honest nor tolerable. Far better to utterly renounce—if so be I must, even though the renunciation stripped bare—than cling against conviction to a sentiment, however consoling, enshrined in a fable, however beautiful, for fear of the desolation that would follow its loss."

Of two things he presently became convinced: the first, that he knew very little of the bearing and import of Christ's teaching; the second, that his mental attitude toward Christ had relation almost entirely to the historical and physical phenomena of his life, and not to the divine element which it manifested. And further that in rationalistic assaults upon Christianity the line of attack was necessarily over the same field. "The assault was ever upon the man-Christ, upon the supposition that that once destroyed, the God-Christ of necessity disappeared; whereas it now began to occur to me that the God-Christ loomed infinitely out of range, and could be reached by no bullet of logic, or of empirical synthesis, and that once apprehended, the man-Christ became invulnerable." . . . "I therefore made up my mind to acquaint myself with Christ's doctrine in his own words, apart from any consideration of the narrative context, taking it directly from the lips of the Master, and meditating upon it in the quiet of my own soul, free from the noise of controversy, theological or rational. . . . To us who have not lived in the wondrous aura of the spiritual life that radiated from his wondrous personality, who cannot drink from his lips, nor look into the infinite depths of his eyes, the closest touch must lie in the words that were spoken for us, and which he knew must satisfy our hunger and thirst for truth." And so, finding truth and life in Christ, he came forth from perplexity and peril into the light of God.

THE FOOTSTEPS OF JESUS.

NEXT to the spiritual joy that is experienced by the soul that lives very near to Christ and follows in his footsteps, there is probably no pleasure that appeals more keenly to the believer's appreciation, in this life at least, than to trace out lovingly, step by step, in Palestine, the localities that have become historically identified with the life of Jesus here on earth. To do this is a task of such surpassing interest and attractiveness that, after many centuries of pilgrimages, the magnetism that draws loving and loyal hearts from all parts of the globe remains unabated. Every year, thousands of devoted Christian men and women linger among the hills and valleys of the Holy Land, or in the ancient cities and villages, searching out every pathway where the Master walked, every eminence from which he discoursed, the familiar scenes of his youth and his manhood, as well as those that witnessed the fruition of his earthly ministry before the tragedy of his death on Calvary. Our illustration possesses a special interest in this connection, as showing the narrow street or lane which formerly led from the public tribunal or judgment seat, to the palace of Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee. It was through this narrow, sunken street (very different then from now), that Jesus was led after having been taken from the house of Caiaphas the high priest to the official residence of Pilate on Mount Zion. Contiguous to the palace was the judgment hall, where trials were usually conducted; but trials in the open air—at the market place or in the highways—were not uncommon, and Pilate caused his ivory curule chair of office to be placed on "the Pavement," a slight level elevation, laid with a mosaic of colored stones and almost in front of the Judgment Hall. Here the trial took place, and Jesus, being a Galilean, was sent by Pilate to Herod, in recognition of the tetrarch's jurisdiction. The gloomy procession took its way through the long, narrow, dingy lane, to the palace, where the lowly Saviour was mocked and scoffed at and abused by Herod and his soldiery. The vassal King — a mere tributary of Rome — treated him as he would have done a vulgar magician and hoped to witness a miracle! In this he was disappointed, for Jesus repelled him with silence. Herod sent him back to Pilate by the way he came and thus it happened that the Son of Man on the last day of his life on earth twice trod the same dingy passage from the palace to "the Pavement." Every step of that last mortal journey of the "Man of Sorrows" is memorable. Passing "Gabbatha" (the "rounded height") with its judgment seat; passing the Prætorium, and threading its way among the crowds, the procession moved toward the gate in the first wall. Early as was the hour, great throngs had assembled, and the clamor became incessant. To Pilate's declaration: "Behold the man!" the fanatic multitude had answered with a cry for Jesus' blood. Doubtless the dingy street shown in the illustration was the scene of like tumultuous incidents that morning. The feast had brought thousands of strangers to Jerusalem, and they helped to swell the mob as it moved through the tortuous ways. Very near, if not along this very path, Jesus bore the Cross, and heard the frenzied cries of the jostling, fierce-faced crowds as they shouted and leaned forward to smite and scoff at the Saviour of the world.

STREET LEADING TO THE PALACE OF HEROD, JERUSALEM.

From a Photograph obtained in Palestine by Rev. Dr. Talmage.

The Jerusalem of the time of Christ no longer exists, the present city being from twenty to thirty feet above the debris of the old. Of Herod's palace only the traces of the great towers that marked its boundaries remain, and above its ruins are a Turkish barracks and an Armenian garden. In our Lord's day, the Herodian palace was a marvel of architectural strength and beauty, and was entirely surrounded by a wall thirty cubits high, with decorated towers at intervals. The noblest relic of those towers is the time-worn pile now known as the Tower of David. "The Pavement," the Judgment Hall, the house of Pilate and that of Caiaphas have all been obliterated, together with the great palace of the Maccabees, where lived Herod Antipas, the slayer of John the Baptist, the mocker of Jesus and the weak slave of his own passions. Even the boundaries of the palace have disappeared. The mile-long route along the "Via Dolorosa" by which Christ went to the Hall of Judgment; and the "Ecce Homo" arch near which Pilate stood when he pointed out Jesus to the mob, are greatly altered amid the changes of the ages; but the footsteps of the Saviour still echo throughout those ancient walks in Mount Sion. The traces of Jesus' life on earth are everywhere seen and felt in Jerusalem and throughout Palestine, although Zion has been ploughed as a field (Micah 3 : 12), and the worldly memorials of Israel's past greatness have vanished forever.

The glorious palace of Solomon, which it is believed was also built on Mount Zion, the palace of the Asmonean Kings and that of Agrippa II. have all likewise perished. The "Glory of Zion has passed away" and even her walls have been demolished. Hardly a stone of any of the original structures remain standing.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE EVENING.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Zech. 14: 7, "At evening time it shall be light."

WHILE "night," in all languages, is the symbol for gloom and suffering, it is often really cheerful, bright, and impressive. I speak not of such nights as come down with no star pouring light from above, or silvered wave tossing up light from beneath—murky, hurtling, portentous, but such as you often see when the pomp and magnificence of heaven turn out on night-parade; and it seems as though the song which the morning stars began so long ago were chiming yet among the constellations, and the sons of God were shouting for joy. Such nights the sailor blesses from the forecastle, and the trapper on the vast prairie, and the belated traveler by the road-side, and the soldier from the tent, earthly hosts gazing upon heavenly, and shepherds guarding their flocks afield, while angel hands above them set the silver bells a-ringing: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace; good-will toward men."

What a solemn and glorious thing is night in the wilderness! Night among the mountains! Night on the ocean! Fragrant night among tropical groves! Flashing night amid arctic severities! Calm night on Roman Campagna! Awful night among the Cordilleras! Glorious night 'mid sea after a tempest! Thank God for the night! The moon and the stars which rule it are light-houses on the coast, toward which I hope we are all sailing, and blind mariners are we if, with so many beaming, burning, flaming glories to guide us, we cannot find our way into the harbor. My text may well suggest that, as the natural evening is often luminous, so it shall be light in the evening of our sorrows—of old age—of the world's history—of the Christian life. "At eventime it shall be light."

This prophecy will be fulfilled in the evening of Christian sorrow. For a long time it is broad daylight. The sun rides high. Innumerable activities go ahead with a thousand feet, and work with a thousand arms, and the pickaxe struck a mine, and the battery made a discovery, and the investment yielded its twenty per cent., and the book came to its twentieth edition, and the farm quadrupled in value, and sudden fortune hoisted to high position, and children were praised, and friends without number swarmed into the family hive, and prosperity sang in the music, and stepped in the dance, and glowed in the wine, and ate at the banquet, and all the gods of music, and ease and gratification gathered around this Jupiter holding in his hands so many thunderbolts of power. But every sun must set, and the brightest [illegible] the sky was overcast. The fountain dried [illegible] into the family fold and carried off the best lamb. A deep howl of woe came crashing down through the joyous symphonies. At one rough twang of the hand of disaster the harp-strings all broke. Down went the strong business firm! Away went long-established credit! Up flew a flock of calumnies! The new book would not sell. A patent could not be secured for the invention. Stocks sank like lead. The insurance company exploded. "How much," says the sheriff, "will you bid for this piano?" "How much for this library?" "How much for this family picture?" Will the grace of God hold one up in such circumstances? What have become of the great multitude of God's children who have been pounded of the flail, and crushed under the wheel, and trampled under the hoof? Did they lie down in the dust, weeping, wailing, and gnashing their teeth? When the rod of fatherly chastisement struck them, did they strike back? Because they found one bitter cup on the table of God's supply, did they upset the whole table? Did they kneel down at their empty money vault and say, "All my treasures are gone?" Did they stand by the grave of their dead, saying, "There never will be a resurrection."

Did they bemoan their thwarted plans and say, "The stocks are down—would God I were dead?" Did the night of their disaster come upon them moonless, starless, dank, and howling, smothering and choking their life out? No! No! No! At eventime it was light. The swift promises overtook them. The eternal constellations, from their circuit about God's throne, poured down an infinite lustre. Under their shining the billows of trouble took on crests, and plumes of gold, and jasper, and amethyst, and flame. All the trees of life rustled in the midsummer air of God's love. The night-blooming assurances of Christ's sympathy filled all the atmosphere with heaven. The soul at every step seemed to start up from its feet bright-winged joys, warbling heavenward. "It is good that I have been afflicted," cries David. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away," exclaims Job. "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing," says St. Paul. "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes," exclaims John, in apocalyptic vision. At eventime it was light. Light from the cross! Light from the promises! Light from the throne! Streaming, joyous, outgushing, everlasting light!

The text shall also find fulfilment in the time of old age. It is a grand thing to be young—to have the sight clear and the hearing acute, and the step elastic, and all our pulses marching on to the drumming of a stout heart. Mid-life and old age will be denied many of us, but youth—we all know what that is. Those wrinkles were not always on your brow. That snow was not always on your head. That brawny muscle did not always bunch your arm. You have not always worn spectacles. Grave and dignified as you now are, you once went coasting down the hill-side, or threw off your hat for the race, or sent the ball flying sky-high. But youth will not always last. It stays only long enough to give us exuberant spirits, and broad shoulders for burden-carrying, and an arm with which to battle our way through difficulties. Life's path, if you follow it long enough, will come under frowning crag and across trembling causeway. Blessed old age, if you let it come naturally. You cannot hide it. You may try to cover the wrinkles, but you cannot cover the wrinkles. If the time has come for you to be old, be not ashamed to be old. The grandest things in all the universe are old. Old mountains; old rivers; old seas; old stars, and an old eternity. Then do not be ashamed to be old, unless you are older than the mountains, and older than the stars.

How men and women will lie! They say they are forty, but they are sixty. They say they are twenty, but they are thirty. They say they are sixty but they are eighty. How some people will lie! Glorious old age, if found in the way of righteousness! How beautiful the old age of Jacob, leaning on the top of his staff; of John Quincy Adams, falling with the harness on; of Washington Irving, sitting, pen in hand, amid the scenes himself had made classical; of John Angell James to the last proclaiming the Gospel to the masses of Birmingham; of Theodore Frelinghuysen, down to feebleness and emaciation devoting his illustrious faculties to the kingdom of God! At eventide it was light!

See that you do honor to the aged. A philosopher stood at the corner of the street day after day, saying to the passers-by, "You will be an old man; you will be an old man." "You will be an old woman; you will be an old woman." People thought he was crazy. I do not think that he was. Smooth the way for that mother's feet; they have not many more steps to take. Steady those tottering limbs; they will soon be at rest. Plough not up that face with any more wrinkles; trouble and care have marked it full enough. Thrust no thorn into that old heart; it will soon cease to beat. "The eye that mocketh its father, and refuseth to obey its mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." The bright morning and hot noonday of life have passed with many. It is four o'clock! five o'clock! six o'clock! The shadows fall longer and thicker and faster. Seven o'clock! eight o'clock! The sun has dipped below the horizon; the warmth has gone out of the air. Nine o'clock! ten o'clock! The heavy dews are falling; the activities of life's day are all hushed; it is time to go to bed. Eleven o'clock! twelve o'clock! The patriarch sleeps the blessed sleep, the cool sleep, the long sleep. Heaven's messengers of light have kindled bonfires of victory all over the heavens. At eventime it is light! Light!

My text shall also find fulfilment in the latter days of the Church. Only a few missionaries, a few churches, a few good men, compared with the institutions leprous and putrified.

It is early yet in the history of everything good. Civilization and Christianity are just getting out of the cradle. The light of martyr-stakes, flashing all up and down the sky, is but the flaming of the morning; but when the evening of the world shall come, glory to God's conquering truth, it shall be light. War's sword clanging back in the scabbard; intemperance buried under ten thousand broken decanters; the world's impurity turning its brow heavenward for the benediction, "Blessed are the pure in heart;" the last vestige of selfishness submerged in heaven-descending charities; all China worshipping Dr. Abeel's Saviour; all India believing in Henry Martyn's Bible; aboriginal superstition acknowledging David Brainerd's piety; human bondage delivered through Thomas Clarkson's Christianity; vagrancy coming back from its pollution at the call of Elizabeth Fry's Redeemer; the mountains coming down; the valleys going up; "holiness" inscribed on horse's bell, and silkworm's thread, and brown-thrasher's wing, and shell's tinge, and manufacturer's shuttle, and chemist's laboratory, and king's sceptre, and nation's Magna Charta. Not a hospital, for there are no wounds; not an asylum, for there are no orphans; not a prison, for there are no criminals; not an almshouse, for there are no paupers; not a tear, for there are no sorrows. The long dirge of earth's lamentation has ended in the triumphal march of redeemed empires, the forests harping it on vine-strung branches, the water chanting it among the gorges, the thunders drumming it among the hills, the ocean giving it forth with its organs, trade-winds touching the keys, and euroclydon's foot on the pedal. I want to see John Howard when the last prisoner is reformed; I want to see Florence Nightingale when the last sabre wound has stopped hurting; I want to see William Penn when the last Indian has been civilized; I want to see John Huss when the last flame of persecution has been extinguished; I want to see John Bunyan after the last pilgrim has come to the gate of the celestial city; above all, I want to see Jesus after the last saint has his throne, and begun to sing hallelujah!

You have watched the calmness and the glory of the evening hour. The laborers have come from the field. The heavens are glowing with an indescribable effulgence, as though the sun in departing had forgotten to shut the gate after it. All the beauty of cloud and leaf swim in the lake. For a star in the sky, a star in the water; heaven above, and heaven beneath. Not a leaf rustling, or a bee humming, or a grasshopper chirping. Silence in the meadow; silence among the hills.

Thus bright and beautiful shall be the evening of the world. The heats of earthly conflict are cooled. The glory of heaven fills all the scene with love, and joy, and peace. At eventime it is light! light!

Finally, my text shall find fulfilment at the end of the Christian's life. You know how a short winter's day is, and how little work you can do. Now, my friends, life is a short winter's day. The sun rises at eight and sets at four. The birth-angel and death-angel fly only a little way apart. Baptism and burial are near together. With one hand the mother rocks the cradle, and with the other she touches the grave.

I went into the house of one of my parishioners on Thanksgiving Day. The little child of the household was bright and glad, and with it I bounded up and down the hall. Christmas day came, and the light of that household had perished. We stood, with black book, reading over the grave, "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust."

But I hurl away this darkness. I cannot have you weep. Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory, at eventime it shall be light! I have seen many Christians die. I never saw any of them die in darkness. What if the billows of death do rise above our girdle, who does not love to bathe? What though other lights do go out in the blast, what do we want of them when all the gates of glory swing open before us, and from a myriad voices, a myriad harps, a myriad thrones, a myriad palaces, there dash upon us. "Hosannah! Hosannah!"

"Throw back the shutters and let the sun come in," said dying Scoville M'Collum, one of my Sabbath School boys. You can see Paul putting on robes, and wings of ascension, as he exclaims, "I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith." Hugh M'Kail went to one side of the scaffold of martyrdom and cried, "Farewell sun, moon and stars! farewell all earthly delights!" Then went to the other side of the scaffold and cried, "Welcome God and Father! Welcome, sweet Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the covenant! Welcome death! Welcome glory!"

A minister of Christ in Philadelphia, dying, said, in his last moments, "I move into the light!" They did not go down doubting, and fearing, and shivering, but their battle-cry rang through all the caverns of the sepulchre, and was echoed back from all the thrones of heaven, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" Sing, my soul, of joys to come.

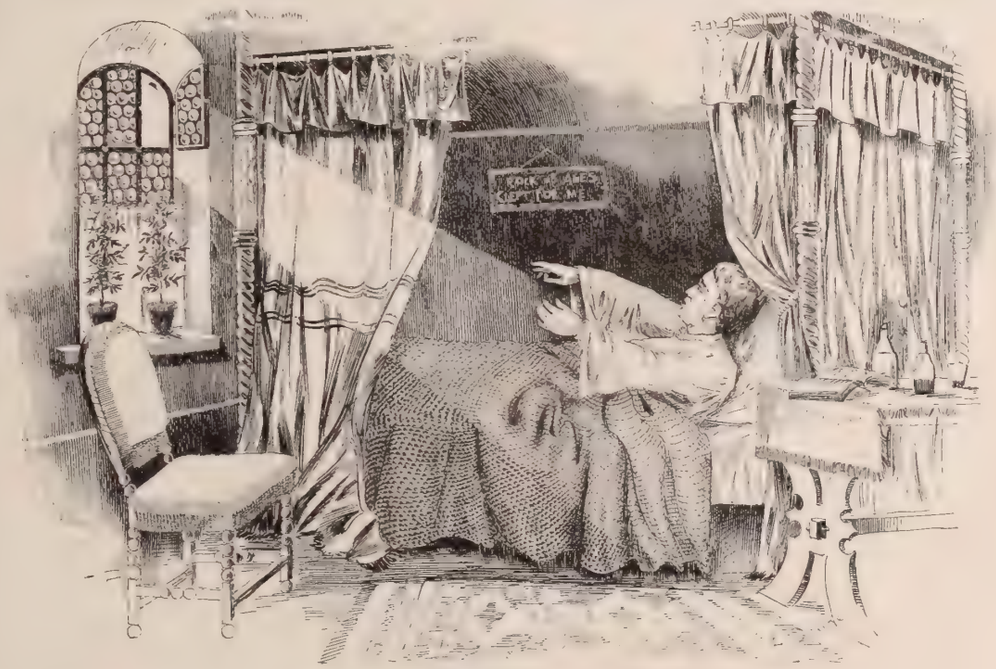
I saw a beautiful being wandering up and down the earth. She touched the aged, and they became young. She touched the poor, and they became rich. I said, "Who is this beautiful being, wandering up and down the earth?" They told me that her name was Death. What a strange thrill of joy when the palsied Christian begins to use his arm again! When the blind Christian begins to see again! When the deaf Christian begins to hear again! When the poor pilgrim puts his feet on such pavement, and joins in such company, and has a free seat in such a great temple! Hungry men no more to hunger; thirsty men no more to thirst; weeping men no more to weep; dying men no more to die. Gather up all sweet words, all jubilant expressions, all rapturous exclamations: bring them to me, and I will pour them upon this stupendous theme of the soul's disenthralment! Oh! the joy of the spirit as it shall mount up toward the throne of God, shouting, Free! Free! Your eye has gazed upon the garniture of earth and heaven; but the eye hath not seen it. Your ear has caught harmonies uncounted and indescribable—caught them from harp's trill, and bird's carol, and waterfall's dash, and ocean's doxology; but the ear hath not heard it. How did those blessed ones get up into the light? What hammer knocked off their chains? What loom wove their robes of light? Who gave them wings? Ah! eternity is not long enough to tell it; seraphim have not capacity enough to realize it—the marvels of redeeming love! Let the palms wave; let the crowns glitter; let the anthems ascend; let the trees of Lebanon clap their hands — they cannot tell the half of it. Archangel before the throne, thou failest! Sing on, praise on, ye hosts of the glorified; and if with your sceptres you cannot reach it, and with your songs you cannot express it, then let all the myriads of the saved unite in the exclamation, "Jesus! Jesus! Jesus!"

There will be a password at the gate of heaven. A great multitude come up and knock at the gate. The gatekeeper says, "The password." They say, "We have no password. We were great on earth and now we come up to be great in heaven." A voice from within answers, "I never knew you." Another group come up to the gate of heaven and knock. The gatekeeper says, "The password." They say, "We have no password. We did a great many noble things on earth. We endowed colleges and took care of the poor." A voice from within says, "I never knew you." Another group come up to the gate of heaven and knock. The gatekeeper says, "The password." They answer, "We were wanderers from God, and deserved to die; but we heard the voice of Jesus—"

"Ay! ay!" says the gatekeeper, "that is the password! Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let these people come in." They go in and surround the throne, jubilant for ever.

Ah! do you wonder that the last hours of the Christian on earth are illuminated by thoughts of the coming glory? Light in the evening. The medicines may be bitter. The pain may be sharp. The parting may be heart-rending. Yet, light in the evening. As all the stars of night sink their anchors of pearl in lake, and river, and sea, so the waves of Jordan shall be illuminated with the down-flashing of the glory to come. The dying soul looks up at the constellations. "The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom shall I fear?" "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Close the eyes of the departed one: earth would seem tame to its enchanted vision. Fold the hands: life's work is ended. Veil the face: it has been transfigured. Mr. Toplady, in his dying hour, said "Light." Coming nearer the expiring moment, he exclaimed, with illuminated countenance, "Light." In the last instant of his breathing, he lifted up his hands and cried, "Light! Light!" Thank God! Thank God for Light in the evening.



"LIGHT! LIGHT!" CRIED TOPLADY IN HIS DYING HOUR.

A PERSECUTED ASSAM CONVERT.

MR. G. H. HOOK, formerly a student in the Pastors' College, London, now pastor of a church at Calcutta, writes: "A tall young Assamese was greatly tried when he decided to follow Christ. They said to him, 'You shall not live to disgrace us among our people by becoming a Christian.' He said in return. 'I shall not die, but live to declare the works of the Lord now I am a Christian.' But he little knew the treachery and wickedness of heathen hearts, though they were his own flesh and blood. One evening, he came home, after the burning heat of a hot day's toil, and they gave him a cup of sherbet to drink. He took it from his father's hand, and drank it, little suspecting that it was poisoned. Then his sister came crying to him, and said softly, 'Have you taken the sherbet?' and he said 'Yes.' Bursting out into sobs, she said, 'Oh, then you will die, for that cup is poisoned! They have put poison in the cup.' At once he went to the hospital, and he recovered from the effects of the poison; but the authorities said, 'You have either taken the poison yourself, or it has been administered to you, and we must know the truth of the matter.' So he had to tell the truth, and his father was entenced to three years' imprisonment, and is in prison now. Thus it was a trial for him to be a Christian, but he is a burning and a shining light, and I am greatly cheered by his consistent life. He stood up, only a few days before his baptism, and preached Christ in Hindustani to the natives who crowded to the vernacular service."

Missionary Martyrs.

Dr. Guinness writes of the Perils that beset Christian Workers in Africa.

IN the history of the Congo Free State, writes Dr. Guinness in The Christian, we question whether there have been any murders quite so audacious as those which have occurred quite recently at Basa Nkosu, one mile from Ikau, the third station of our Congo Balolo Mission. Two brave officers, Messrs. Peters and Termol, were apparently surprised by hostile natives, and before their black soldiers could interfere, the Mongos had beheaded Mr. Peters and speared Mr. Termol, leaving the latter to welter in his own blood, whilst they carried off the head of the former in triumph. The State soldiery immediately sent messengers down country to the station at Wangata, on the main Congo, from whence reinforcements were obtained to punish the murderers and to restore tranquility in the district This was the second occasion in which our friends at Ikau were in imminent danger. Early in December, after the tragic death of his young wife, Mr. Haupt nearly lost his life in a determined attack that was made upon the station by these very people, His goods were stolen, but his house was eventually saved from destruction.

Matters had not really quieted down before the occurrence of the atrocious murder alluded to, the success of which fired the people with the desire to exterminate all the white population, they attempted to bribe our neighbors to bind the missionaries, and gave them over into their hands, and to this end they offered several slaves, besides other inducements, which, however, were refused by our faithful friends.

For at least a week matters were in a very critical state, and it was quite impossible to say what a day might bring forth. The popular impression that a white man was invulnerable, and could not be killed by a spear, was now exploded, and even at our station at Bonginda, ninety miles below, the effect of this revelation of our weakness inspired a violent chief called Ibengi to threaten death to the missionaries there. One night the feeling at Bonginda was so strained that it was deemed wise to get up steam on board the Pioneer, so as to be able, in the event of a night attack, to escape by the river.

The most distant outpost of Christianity in these regions is Bongandanga, where last October brave Scarnell died alone, before relief, which was on its way up river, could reach him. His devoted black boys buried him near the little chapel, and then bore the sad tidings to Mr. Ellery, who only reached the station to find that his companion in labor had finished his course, and been called into the immediate presence of the King. The sheaf of wheat had fallen into the ground, and the harvest was ensured.

To-day Messrs. Haupt and Coote are holding the fort at this station; they are the only white men within three days' journey, and in case of native attack or sickness, it would take at least a week to send a canoe down river and receive assistance. We are hoping, at the earliest possible opportunity, to strengthen this station to its full complement of five helpers, and are only hindered in this through lack of means.

After the murders at Basa Nkosu, 120 miles down river, the whole of that district was thrown into a state of ferment, and, in order to escape the vengeance of the State, many of the people deserted their homes and escaped up river. Some of them reached Bongandanga, and their howls could be heard in the bush at night-time. Our brethren were in danger of being murdered by these refugees at any time. This was only an accentuation of their ordinary difficulties, for there is a neighboring tribe of Ngombe, whose cannibal ferocity has been a perpetual source of peril,

A CALL FOR SERVICE.

A CAPTAIN at evening roll-call, writes Francis E. Williard, said to his company: "Soldiers, I am ordered to detail ten men for a very dangerous service, but of the greatest importance to the army in the coming battle. I have not the heart to pick the men, for the chances are against their ever coming back. But if there are ten men in the company who will volunteer for this service, they may step two paces to the front." As the captain ceased speaking, the whole line stepped two paces forward and stood there with every man in his place, and ranks even as before. The captain's eyes were dim and his voice faltered as he said: "Soldiers, I thank you; I am proud to be captain of such a company." Fellow-workers, just such a spirit should move the whole prohibition line. We wage a war fiercer than that of bullet or bayonet, and far more vital to human good. It is a struggle whose echoes enlist the hosts in heaven."

BISHOP TUCKER IN UGANDA.

A LETTER has been received from Bishop Tucker, the successor of the martyred Bishop Hannington, from Mengo, the capital of Uganda. The journey inland had been accomplished safely, with no sickness or accident. The Bishop preached in the new church to a congregation numbering over 5,000, the king and chiefs of the country being present. Fourteen loads of books were brought in, containing 8,000 copies of portions of the Scriptures in Luganda, and the people were nearly besides themselves with delight at the prospect of receiving the books which the Bishop says were to be sold the next day, adding, "They will go like a puff of smoke."

PAUL AT CORINTH.

S. S. Lesson for July 23. Acts 18: 1 11 Golden Text, I Cor. 1: 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE word of the cross is to them that are perishing, foolishness; but unto us which are being saved, it is the power of God." (1. Cor. 1-18, R.V.) Whether among the æsthetic Athenians, the commercial Philippians and Corinthians, the savages of Melita, or the would-be pious Jews, the word of the Cross is to each man what he makes it to be by his attitude towards it. The Cross of Jesus touches all mankind. Because of the suffering of death he was "crowned with glory and honor that, by the grace of God he should taste death for every man" (Heb. 11: 9); "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." (Isa. 43: 6.) "Every man," "all," "there is no difference, all have sinned," and "God so loved the world," (every man, all), "that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And yet there are many who are perishing! The word of hearing does not profit them because they are not united by faith unto them that hear. God gives, but they do not receive, and the Word which was spoken to bring life has become death to them.

Wherever Paul preached, the Word of God which he served, to which he was a witness, it brought about division between receivers and rejectors, those who were saved and those who perished. His testimony borne at Athens, God led this apostle of the Gentiles to Corinth, one of the centres for the world's commerce. Would that Word which had proved to be the power of God to some souls in literary, artistic Athens, be also the power of God among the money-loving merchants of Corinth? Paul learned by God's Spirit how infinitely small was the difference of circumstances in which he might be placed, and how infinitely great was the power of God in his Word to overcome them.

Did a Sure Work;

Paul found at Corinth, probably in the synagogue, a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy with his wife, Priscilla, on account of an order which had been issued by Claudius Cæsar, the reigning emperor of Rome, that all Jews should leave that city. Probably Aquila was a Christian Jew, and Paul in his labors in Asia may have become acquainted with him previously, perhaps he was the means of his conversion. In any case he took up his abode with them, and joined them in the business by which they earned their living. Paul counted it a privilege to maintain himself, so that he might not be "burdensome" to the church. Even when he had to break into the hours of the night he would rather maintain himself than let those men think, to whom he came with a Gospel without money and without price, that he would seek to benefit himself by preaching the Gospel. "Laboring night and day because we would not be chargeable to any of you, we preached unto you the Gospel of God." He counted it his reward that when he preached the Gospel he might "make the Gospel of Christ without charge." Yet under the discipline of the Holy Ghost, his business was so kept in check, and so took the second place, that he only gained enough for his wants, nothing for luxury or self-indulgence: "Yea, yourselves know that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to them that were with me" (Acts 22: 34), for Paul coveted no man's silver or gold or apparel" (verse 33), and never became a rich man. In the spirit of holy, willing, joyous sacrifice, and not self-interest, he worked at his trade with Aquila and Priscilla, and at the same time "reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks."

But when Silas and Timothy came from Macedonia, the very presence of two more [illegible] which Paul was very sensitive. He understood true church life, the interdependence of the members of the Body of Christ. Only those who have experienced it know the power of a few praying souls in a meeting. Blessed are those to whom God has given praying ones near or far to bear them up continually in prayer. But there is something of very real strength in the presence of brethren or sisters in the Lord who walk before God and are taught by the same Christ and who understand God's leading of us. It gave an impetus to Paul, he was pressed in the Spirit and testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ. Some thing must happen now, the synagogue was divided, some opposed and blasphemed. It was a critical moment for Paul: God had been gradually preparing him to be "the apostle of the Gentiles." (Rom. 11: 13); he shook his raiment, turned his back upon the synagogue, and took his few converts, including Crispus the ruler of the synagogue into the house of Justus, one of his converts, and God gave him fruit; some heard, believed, and were baptized. A breach was made with the Jews by Paul for the first time. In most places they had cast him out, but, on this occasion, he left them, saying: "Your blood be on your own heads, I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.

It may have been his last step in the loss of all things for Christ, that he should now give up his hopes for the Jew and turn to the Gentiles. But God bore witness to him, and said to him in the night by a vision: "Be not afraid, but speak and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city." O how faithful is our God! His ways of guiding his people are so perfect. Paul was no visionary; strong-minded and practical, he was not the man to yield to imagination. But the Lord saw that just now, when all his life's prejudices and lines of thought were overturned, he needed something exceptional in the way of guidance just as formerly at Troas, and afterwards in the ship on the Mediterranean Sea (Acts 16: 9; 27: 23), God spoke to him in visions. So Paul "continued there a year and six months, teaching the Word of God among them." Only the distinct guidance of God, which Paul well understood, could have determined the length of his stay in the various places to which God sent him. There was nothing uniform, nothing systematic, and yet, on the other hand, nothing eccentric about his movements. Confident that God had a plan with which all his directions were consistent, the great apostle of the Gentiles simply followed and obeyed.

During all this time the unbelieving Jews had been restrained by God from any open persecution. The very thing which was permitted at Philippi, Thessalonica and Berea,—persecution after a very short preaching of the Gospel, was withheld here,—that in one church at least in Europe, there might be a deep foundation laid of Bible instruction.

It was to this Church that he wrote his two Epistles to the Corinthians, unfolding such wondrous truths of man's nothingness, and of Christ as everything to his people—Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification and Redemption. (1. Cor. 1: 30.) He taught them that they were yet carnal, babes in Christ," because of their divisions (chap. 3), and thus he could unfold the wondrous teaching of the Body of Christ (1. Cor. 12), God's cure for self. He taught them how the body of the believer is a temple of the Holy Ghost. (1. Cor. 3: 16, 17; 6: 19), and then (1. Cor. 15). the glorious truth of the resurrection. It would seem that to the Corintians and the Ephesians among whom he tarried longer than in many other places, he could tell out more in detail than to other churches the wondrous truths which God committed to him about the Church of Christ which is his Body. And well may we believe that it was specially ordered of God that, just in these two great commercial centres of Asia and of Europe, the ministry of the apostle should be prolonged, that from these centres men of other nations visiting those ports for the sake of commerce, might hear the blessed tidings of salvation and carry light and life with them again into other parts.

Then things were ripe; the Jews raised an insurrection, and brought Paul before Gallio, the Roman ruler, with the charge: "This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law." Nothing happens without God's permission and overruling. He turned the malice of the Jews into confusion. Gallio saw more fault in the accusers than in the accused: "If it were a matter of wrong or lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you. But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it, for I will be no judge of such matters." Thus God allowed the opponents of his truth to be turned into ridicule and persecution to fail. Paul tarried there yet a good while. After leaving Corinth he sailed into Syria, then went to Ephesus, and from thence to Cesarea and Jerusalem, afterwards into Asia Minor, and thence a second time into Greece.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

Orientals Weaving Tent-Cloth.

THE Apostle quitted Athens soon after the events which formed the subject of last week's lesson. He went thence to Corinth, a city as famous for its wealth as Athens was for its learning. It was the capital of the province of Achaia, which practically corresponds with modern Greece. It stood on the isthmus, or narrow strip of land, which unites Morea (the ancient Peloponnesus) to the mainland. As the isthmus is less than four miles wide, the city stretched across it from the Gulf of Lepanto to the Gulf of Ægina and had a harbor on each sea. The facilities thus given to shipping attracted commerce and made the city a busy and wealthy centre. It was, like Philippi, a Roman colony and was about a hundred years old when Paul visited it. The ancient city, on the same site, had been destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C. But, a century later, Julius Cæsar rebuilt it and colonized it with freedmen from Rome. Farrar thinks that when Paul visited it there were 400,000 people in the city. They were, as we learn from secular historians, notorious for their vicious lives, and made extensive provision for gratifying the vicious propensities of the merchants who visited the city for trade. They even went so far as to make the hideous and revolting combination of religion and vice, in the worship of Aphrodite, the Greek Venus. Paul labored among them for a year and a half. He appears to have been without funds, for he worked as a tent-maker until Silas and Timothy, whom he had left behind, arrived, bringing gifts from Philippi and Berea. These tents are believed to have been made of woven goats'-hair from Paul's native district of Cilicia. When Paul learned the art as a boy, he probably never expected to earn his living by it. But it was the custom among even the wealthiest men to have their sons taught a trade, so that if occasion arose, they could support themselves. The wisdom of such a custom Paul was now proving. The phraseology of the narrative indicates that he did not labor as a matter of principle, but of necessity; and that on the arrival of his young brethren, he accepted the gifts and gladly turned his time to better account than in manual labor. Aquila and Priscilla, the converted Jew and his wife, whose acquaintance Paul made at Corinth, continued to be his faithful friends after he left Corinth. They eventually went back to Rome and a church was formed in their house, as we learn from Romans 16: 3-5. It is a significant fact that so high an official as the ruler of the synagogue should also have been among Paul's converts at Corinth. An interesting episode, not contained in the lesson, but worth notice, is the scene in the court of Gallio, the Roman proconsul. Gallio's name was Annœus Novatus. He was one of the Stoics, a man of a gentle, lovable disposition. The Jews probably thought they could coerce him to condemn Paul by raising a tumult, as they coerced Pilate at Christ's trial. But he was a man of different mould from Pilate, and besides, he had a clean record, which Pilate had not. He told them frankly that he was there to adjudicate in matters of law and order, but as to theology—questions of their law—he said contemptuously that he would be no judge in such matters. His sympathies must have been with Paul or he would have interfered when the people mobbed the Jewish prosecutor in the court.

He abode with them and wrought. It was a hard life that of toiling for daily bread while he was preaching and teaching. Doubtless, a man of Paul's learning and ability, could easily have procured lucrative employment, but he chose to provide for his daily needs by this humble occupation which could be discontinued at any time, until gifts came from other churches. San Quala, the native apostle of Central Burmah, was, in consequence of his ability and influence, offered a lucrative appointment by the British Commissioner at Pegu. Without hesitation he declined the offer, though having no salary and depending for food and clothing on the people to whom he preached. He replied, "I will not have the money, I will not mix up God's work with Government work. There are others to do this thing, employ them. When I eat with the children of poverty I am content; I came to this land that its poor benighted inhabitants might be saved." In two-and-a-half years this man had gathered thirty churches, and baptized more than two thousand adult believers with his own hands.

Testified to the Jews. Paul yearned for the conversion of his people and in spite of all they had made him suffer, it was to them he went first with his message. There was no feature more remarkable in the character of Timour than his extraordinary perseverance. No difficulties ever led him to recede from what he had once undertaken; and he often persisted in his efforts under circumstances which led all around him to despair. On such occasions he used to relate to his friends an anecdote of his early life. "I once," he said, "was forced to take shelter from my enemies in a ruined building, where I sat alone many hours. Desiring to divert my mind from my hopeless condition, I fixed my eyes on an ant that was carrying a grain of corn larger than itself up a high wall. I numbered the efforts it made to accomplish this object. The grain fell sixty-nine times to the ground; but the insect persevered, and the seventieth time it reached the top. This sight gave me courage at the moment, and I never forgot the lesson."

Your blood be upon your own heads. No man is forced to become a Christian. All that can be done for him is to warn and entreat. If he refuses the loss and responsibility are his own. On the bank of the Niagara River, where the rapids begin to swell and swirl most desperately, preparatory to their final plunge, is a sign-board which bears a most startling legend. "Past Redemption Point," it reads. To read it, even while one feels the firm soil beneath his feet, sends a shiver of horror through one's soul as he looks off upon the turbulent waters, and realizes the full significance of the sign. The one who gets into those boiling rapids, and passes that point, cannot retrace his way, cannot pull to shore, cannot be rescued by friends. He is not yet dead, but he might as well be. He must give up all hope of rescue, he can only float on, swiftly and mere swiftly, until death ends his suspense and misery. Past redemption point!

No man shall set on thee to hurt thee. The assurance must have been comforting because, as Paul knew, God could fulfil the promise. We do not always know how he protects his children but he does so. A lady was wakened up one morning by a strange noise of pecking at the window, and when she got up she saw a butterfly flying backwards and forwards inside the window in a great fright, because outside there was a sparrow pecking at the glass wanting to reach the butterfly. The butterfly did not see the glass, but it saw the sparrow, and evidently expected every moment to be caught. Neither did the sparrow see the glass, though it saw the butterfly, and made sure of catching it. Yet all the while the butterfly, because of that thin, invisible sheet of glass, was actually as safe as if it had been miles away from the sparrow. It is when we forget our Protector that we become worried and apprehensive.

Speak and hold not thy peace. It must have often seemed useless to go on speaking with no result but opposition. The duty, however, belongs to us and the results to God. A missionary in China was greatly depressed by the carelessness of his hearers. One day the words of Isa. 53: 1, came to his mind as sent from above, and they were followed by a dream. He thought he was standing near a rocky boulder, and trying with all his might to break it with a sledge-hammer, but blow after blow had no effect, there was no impression made. At length he heard a voice, which said, "Never mind, go on, I will pay you all the same, whether you break it or not." So he went on doing the work that was given him and was content.

her decease produced a profound sensation. The closed blinds of the corner-cottage suggested to high and low incidents of the busy existence that had become a part of the history of the town. Men gathered in groups on the street-corners to discuss in bated tones national events with which the life that had gone out was connected; women, in their own homes, or "running over" to sit upon a neighbor's doorstep or porch, in the sweet informal fashion of Southern sociability, reminded one another of the many "ways," the very eccentricity of which was charming now, that had marked Madam Washington's individuality.

Of how used they were to see her in the summer sunsets emerge from the side-gate of her garden (the one by which Lafayette entered), and pace slowly down the side-walk to the stable to be sure that Stephen bedded and fed the horses, and that Betsy, his wife, "stripped" the last and richest drops of cream from the cows. She would stand at the open doors of the stable, watching these operations and giving orders for the night or morrow, exchanging cheery salutations with chance passers-by, her never-idle fingers busy with her knitting, or, at certain seasons, picking out the black seeds from a mass of raw cotton in her apron. People used to smile at the homely picture when they remembered her stately son. They recalled later that there was ever a sort of dignity about her; that she never gossiped; how kindly was her interest in the suffering and sorrowing, and that diligence in business became the New World housewife more than elegant idleness.

It was a gentle knoll not far from the Kenmore grounds, and crowned by a few gray boulders overshadowed by a clump of trees. It had been remarked that she often resorted to this retreat, sometimes alone with her basket of mending, or her knitting, or her Bible. Nobody passed very near at such times, for the place lay apart from any footpath, but many had seen from a distance the motionless figure seated upon a flat rock, and wondered "what the old Madam" was thinking about, sitting there so long.

Oftener, she was surrounded by the Lewis children, who preferred "Grandmother's Bible-stories" to any others they ever heard. The granddaughter of one of the little band relates that "the manner of her speaking was so deeply impressive that neither the lessons taught nor the scenes connected with them were ever forgotten by the young listeners." As one of them related, when he was himself growing old,—"There was a spell over them as they looked into grandmother's uplifted face, with its sweet expression of perfect peace, and they were very quiet during the homeward walk."

I sat for a long hour upon the flat gray rock one fair May day a few months ago. The "two splended pines towering above it" have died a natural death, and deciduous trees have taken their place. They cast flickering shadows upon the rough surface of the boulder as the wind stirred them and rustled the grasses and wild flowers growing about the base. The knoll falls gently away to the beautiful valley of the Rappahannock, a panorama of fertile farms, groves, and homesteads, bounded by low hills curving against the horizon.

The Rappahannock mart mourned for her on the August day of the funeral, as one man. Business was suspended, and crape hung from most of the closed shops and warehouses. The sanctuary in which she had been a reverent communicant was thronged to hear the burial service read above the remains. The coffin was carried from the church on men's shoulders to the quiet hillside, and every foot of the knoll was covered by the concourse of mourners and spectators. All over the country press and pulpit made solemn note of the event; in New York, members of Congress and many private citizens wore crape for thirty days, as for a distinguished public official.

On the evening of Thursday, Aug. 27, 1789, a near neighbor of Mary Washington penned this tribute to her memory:—

"It is usual, when virtuous and conspicuous persons quit this terrestrial abode, to publish elaborate panegyrics on their characters, but suffice it to say that she conducted herself through this transitory life with virtue and prudence worthy of the mother of the greatest hero that ever adorned the annals of history. There is no fame in the world more pure than that of the mother of Washington, and no woman since the mother of Christ has left a better claim to the affectionate reverence of mankind."

George Washington Parke Custis, the grandson of Martha Washington, and the adopted son of the first President, wrote thirty-seven years after her decease:—

"Thus lived and died this distinguished woman. Had she been of the olden time, statues would have been erected to her memory at the Capitol, and she would have been called the Mother of Romans. When another century has elapsed, and our descendants shall have learned the true value of liberty, how will the fame of the parental chief be cherished in story and in song! Nor will be forgotten she who first bent the twig to incline the tree to glory. Then, and not till then, will youth and age, maid and matron, ay, and bearded men, repair to the now-neglected grave of the mother of Washington."

The tale of the various attempts to erect a suitable memorial above the grave dates very far back. Projects were agitated soon after Mrs. Washington's death to mark the spot by a stone to be paid for by the United States Government. In the confusion attendant upon the establishment of a new nation, these lapsed, were revived, and again forgotten. Mr. Custis's stirring appeal in 1826 awoke interest all over the country, and for some months it seemed that the work would be done. The proverbial apathy of republics to their dead benefactors was not so easily overcome. The Kenmore estate passed out of the Lewis family, and the succeeding proprietors buried the dead of two generations near the now sunken mound under which lay all that was mortal of Mary Washington, with the faithful housekeeper and lifelong friend of Mrs. Lewis close beside her.

THE HOME OF MARY WASHINGTON.

In 1833, Silas Burrows, a wealthy and patriotic citizen of New York, offered to bear the whole expense of constructing a stately monument to the memory of "Mary, the mother of Washington."

The design lies before me as I write. A square pedestal bears the simple inscription I have just set down. Grecian columns, two on each side, are set in embrasures above; four eagles sit over these; an obelisk tapers to the bust of Washington, and upon the bust is a fifth eagle, with outstretched wings and beak. The conception is fantastic and ungraceful, and was to be expensive.

The corner-stone was laid with great pomp and circumstance, which were duly detailed in the best manner of the Jenkyns of the day in the columns of the New York Mirror, date of June 8, 1833. Brittle pages that crack as we flutter them are covered with eulogy of the dead and the self-gratulations of the living. We read with mournful curiosity, considering what followed it all, that early on the morning of May 7, 1833, the city was crowded to overflowing.

The corner-stone was adjusted with Masonic ceremonies, and Andrew Jackson laid upon it the engraved plate, "intended to distinguish it." In the address that accompanied the transfer of the plate from the hands of Mr. Bassett—a relative of Madam Washington and chairman of the Monument Committee—into those of the President, Mr. Bassett said:

"Let us carry with us hence, engraved on our hearts, the memory of her who is here interred: her fortitude, her piety, her every grace of life; her sweet peace in death, through her sure hope of a blessed immortality."
